PUBLISHER'S NOTE

The present English edition of V. I. Lenin's The State and Revolution to a substantial extent follows previous English translations. In comparing these translations with the original text in the fourth Russian edition of Lenin's Works, Vol. XXV published in 1950, it was found necessary to make a number of corrections and revisions. The notes at the end of the book are mainly adopted from those given in the Works, with a few additions from earlier English editions.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

¶1 The question of the state is now acquiring particular importance both in theory and in practical politics. The imperialist war has immensely accelerated and intensified the process of transformation of monopoly capitalism into state monopoly capitalism. The monstrous oppression of the working masses by the state, which is merging more and more with the all-powerful capitalist associations, is becoming ever more monstrous. The advanced countries--we speak here of their "rear"--are being converted into military convict prisons for the workers.

¶2 The unprecedented horrors and miseries of the protracted war are making the position of the masses unbearable and increasing their indignation. The international proletarian revolution is clearly maturing. The question of its relation to the state is acquiring practical importance.

¶3 The elements of opportunism that accumulated during the decades of comparatively peaceful development have given rise to the trend of social-chauvinism which dominates the official socialist parties throughout the world. This trend-socialism in words and chauvinism in deeds (Plekhanov, Potresov, Breshkovskaya, Rubanovich, and, in a slightly veiled form, Messrs. Tsereteli, Chernov and Co. in Russia; Scheidemann, Legien, David and others in Germany; Renaudel, Guesde, Vandervelde in France and Belgium; Hyndman and the Fabians² in England, etc., etc.)--is distinguished by the base, servile adaptation of the "leaders of socialism" to the interests not only of "their" national bourgeoisie, but precisely of "their" state; for the majority of the so-called Great Powers have long been exploiting and enslaving a whole number of small and weak nationalities. And the imperialist war is precisely a war for the division and redivision of this kind of booty. The struggle for the emancipation of the working masses from the influence of the bourgeoisie in general, and of the imperialist bourgeoisie in particular, is impossible without a struggle against opportunist prejudices concerning the "state."

¶4 First of all we examine the teaching of Marx and Engels on the state and dwell in particular detail on those aspects of this teaching which have been forgotten or have been subjected to opportunist distortion. Then we investigate specially the main representative of these distortions, Karl Kautsky, the best-known leader of the Second International (1889-1914), which has met with such miserable bankruptcy in the present war. Finally, we shall sum up the main results of the experience of the Russian revolutions of 1905 and particularly of 1917. Apparently, the latter is now (early August 1917) completing the first phase of its development; but this revolution as a whole can only be understood as a link in a chain of socialist proletarian revolutions being called forth by the imperialist war. Hence, the question of the relation of the socialist proletarian revolution to the state is acquiring not only practical political importance but also the importance of a most urgent problem of the day, the problem of explaining to the masses what they will have to do in the immediate future to free themselves from the yoke of capital.

Preface to the First Edition

In this section Lenin summarizes the political situation of late 1917. He analyzes the origins and content of opportunism in the workers' movement and presents the method of fighting it.

¶1-2. What are the aspects of the question of the state? What intensifies this question? What forms does the intensification take? What practical questions arise?

¶3. What gives rise to opportunism and from what does it draw? What is social chauvinism? What distinguishes it? What is the character and object of the Great War? What is necessary for the emancipation of the masses?

¶4. What aspects of Marxism will this pamphlet address in detail? Whose views will also be examined and why? What chain of revolutions is involved? What is the practical significance of the question of the state?

CHAPTER I

CLASS SOCIETY AND THE STATE

1. THE STATE AS A PRODUCT OF THE IRRECONCILABILITY OF CLASS CONTRADICTIONS

¶1 What is now happening to Marx's teaching has, in the course of history, happened repeatedly to the teachings of revolutionary thinkers and leaders of oppressed classes struggling for emancipation. During the lifetime of great revolutionaries, the oppressing classes meted out to them constant persecution, received their teachings with the most savage malice, the most furious hatred and the most unscrupulous campaigns of lies and slander. After their death, attempts are made to convert them into harmless icons, to canonize them, so to say, and to surround their names with a certain halo for the "consolation" of the oppressed classes and in order to dupe the latter, while at the same time emasculating the content of the revolutionary teaching, blunting its revolutionary edge and vulgarizing it. At the present time, the bourgeoisie and the opportunists within the working-class movement concur in this "doctoring" of Marxism. They forget, obliterate and distort the revolutionary side of this teaching, its revolutionary soul. They push to the foreground and extol what is or seems acceptable to the bourgeoisie. All the social-chauvinists are now "Marxists" (don't laugh!). And more and more frequently, German bourgeois scholars, but yesterday specialists in the annihilation of Marxism, are speaking of the "national-German" Marx, who, they aver, educated the workers' unions which are so splendidly organized for the purpose of conducting a predatory war!

¶2 In such circumstances, in view of the unprecedentedly widespread distortions of Marxism, our prime task is to reestablish what Marx really taught on the subject of the state. For this purpose it will be necessary to quote at length from the works of Marx and Engels themselves. Of course, long quotations will render the text cumbersome and will not help to make it popular reading, but we cannot possibly do without them. All, or at any rate, all the decisive passages in the works of Marx and Engels on the subject of the state must without fail be quoted as fully as possible, in order that the reader may form an independent opinion of the totality of the views of the founders of scientific socialism and of the development of those views, and in order that their distortion by the now dominant "Kautskyism" may be documentarily proved and clearly demonstrated.

¶3 Let us begin with the most widely read of Engels' works, The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State, the sixth edition of which was published in Stuttgart as far back as 1894. We shall have to translate the quotations from the German original, as the Russian translations, although very numerous, are for the most part either incomplete or very unsatisfactory.

¶4 Summing up his historical analysis, Engels says:

"The state is, therefore, by no means a power forced on society from without; just as little is it 'the reality of the ethical idea,' 'the image and reality of reason,' as Hegel maintains. Rather, it is a product of society at a certain stage of development; it is the admission that this society has become entangled in an insoluble contradiction with itself, that it has split into irreconcilable opposites which it is powerless to conjure away. But in order that these opposites, classes with conflicting economic interests, might not consume themselves and society in fruitless struggle, it became necessary to have a power seemingly standing above society that would moderate the conflict and keep it within the bounds of 'order'; and this power, arisen out of society but placing itself above it, and alienating itself more and more from it, is the state." (Pp. 177-78, sixth German edition.)³

¶5 This expresses with perfect clarity the basic idea of Marxism concerning the historical role and the significance of the state. The state is a product and manifestation of the irreconcilability of class contradictions. The state arises where, when and to the extent that class contradictions objectively cannot be reconciled. And, conversely, the existence of the state proves that class contradictions are irreconcilable. It is precisely on this most important and fundamental point that the distortion of Marxism, proceeding along two main lines, begins.

¶1-2. How do the oppressor classes treat the teachings of revolutionaries? How does this apply to Marx and Engels? What part do the social-chauvinists play, and the German bourgeois scholars? What task arises? How is it to be fulfilled?

¶3-5. What, according to Engels, is the state not? How does it arise and why? What antagonism does it represent and how? What semblance arises? What aspect does Lenin stress? What converse? How does this question stand in relation to Marxism, and what do the opportunists do with it?

¶6 On the one hand, bourgeois and particularly petty-bourgeois ideologists, compelled under the weight of indisputable historical facts to admit that the state only exists where there are class contradictions and the class struggle, "correct" Marx in such a way as to make it appear that the state is an organ for the reconciliation of classes. According to Marx, the state could neither arise nor maintain itself if it were possible to reconcile classes. According to the petty-bourgeois and philistine professors and publicists it appears that the state does reconcile classes (very frequently they benignantly refer to Marx to prove this!). According to Marx, the state is an organ of class rule, an organ for the oppression of one class by another; it is the creation of "order," which legalizes and perpetuates this oppression by moderating the conflict between the classes. In the opinion of the petty-bourgeois politicians, order means precisely the reconciliation of classes, and not the oppression of one class by another; moderating the conflict means reconciling classes, and not depriving the oppressed classes of definite means and methods of struggle to overthrow the oppressors.

¶7 For instance, when, in the revolution of 1917, the question of the significance and the role of the state actually arose in all its magnitude as a practical question demanding immediate action and, what is more, action on a mass scale, all the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks immediately and completely sank to the petty-bourgeois theory that the "state" "reconciles" classes. Innumerable resolutions and articles by politicians of both these parties are thoroughly saturated with this petty-bourgeois and philistine "reconciliation" theory. That the state is an organ of the rule of a definite class which cannot be reconciled with its antipodes (the class opposite to it) is something the petty-bourgeois democrats will never be able to understand. Their attitude towards the state is one of the most striking manifestations of the fact that our Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks are not socialists at all (a point that we Bolsheviks have always maintained), but petty-bourgeois democrats with near-socialist phraseology.

¶8 On the other hand, the "Kautskyite" distortion of Marxism is far more subtle. "Theoretically," it is not denied that the state is an organ of class rule, or that class contradictions are irreconcilable. But what is lost sight of or glossed over is this: If the state is a product of the irreconcilability of class contradictions, if it is a power standing above society and "alienating itself more and more from it," then it is obvious that the liberation of the oppressed class is impossible not only without a violent revolution, but also without the destruction of the apparatus of state power which was created by the ruling class and which is the embodiment of this "alienation." As we shall see later, Marx very definitely drew this theoretically self-evident conclusion as a result of a concrete historical analysis of the tasks of the revolution. And--as we shall show in detail further on--it is precisely this conclusion which Kautsky . . . has "forgotten" and distorted.

2. SPECIAL BODIES OF ARMED MEN, PRISONS, ETC.

¶1 Engels continues:

"In contradistinction to the old gentile [tribal or clan] organization, the state, first, divides its subjects according to territory."

Such a division seems "natural" to us, but it cost a prolonged struggle against the old organization according to clans or tribes. "The second distinguishing feature is the establishment of a public power which no longer directly coincides with the population organizing itself as an armed force. This special public power is necessary because a self-acting armed organization of the population has become impossible since the split into classes.... This public power exists in every state; it consists not merely of armed men but also of material adjuncts, prisons and institutions of coercion of all kinds, of which gentile [clan] society knew nothing."

¶2 Engels further elucidates the concept of the "power" which is termed the state, a power which arose from society, but places itself above it and alienates itself more and more from it. What does this power mainly consist in? It consists in special bodies of armed men which have prisons, etc., at their command.

¶6-8. [Note: Lenin speaks here of bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideologists. An opportunist is such a person posing as a Marxist.-AH] How do the bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideologists "correct" Marx? What does Marx in fact say? What is the function of the state? What are the opposing class views? What character did the question of the state take on in 1917? What did the S-R's and Mensheviks do? How does Lenin criticize them? How does the Kautskyite distortion compare? Of what is sight lost? How did Marx draw his conclusions?

¶1-2 What is the first division that arises with the state? The second? What aspects does Lenin emphasize?

¶3 We are justified in speaking of special bodies of armed men, because the public power which is an attribute of every state "no longer directly coincides" with the armed population, with its "self-acting armed organization."

¶4 Like all great revolutionary thinkers, Engels tries to draw the attention of the class-conscious workers precisely to that which the predominant philistinism regards as least worthy of attention, as most habitual and sanctified by prejudices that are not only firmly rooted but, one might say, petrified. A standing army and police are the chief instruments of force of the state power. But--can things, indeed, be otherwise?

¶5 From the viewpoint of the vast majority of Europeans at the end of the nineteenth century whom Engels was addressing, and who had not lived through or observed at close quarters a single great revolution, things could not be otherwise. They completely failed to understand what a "self-acting armed organization of the population" was. To the question of why there arose the need for special bodies of armed men, placing themselves above society and alienating themselves from it (police and standing army), the West European and Russian philistines are inclined to answer with a few phrases borrowed from Spencer or Mikhailovsky, by referring to the growing complexity of social life, the differentiation of functions, and so forth.

¶6 Such a reference seems "scientific," and splendidly lulls the man in the street to sleep by obscuring the most important and basic fact, namely, the split of society into irreconcilably antagonistic classes.

¶7 Were it not for this split, the "self-acting armed organization of the population" would differ from the primitive organization of a stick-wielding herd of monkeys, or of primitive man, or of men united in clans, by its complexity, its higher technique, and so forth; but such an organization would still be possible.

¶8 It is impossible, because civilized society is split into antagonistic and, moreover, irreconcilably antagonistic classes, the "self-acting" arming of which would lead to an armed struggle between them. The state arises, a special power is created--special bodies of armed men; and every revolution, by destroying the state apparatus, clearly demonstrates to us how the ruling class strives to restore the special bodies of armed men which serve it, and how the oppressed class strives to create a new organization of this kind, capable of serving not the exploiters but the exploited.

¶9 In the above argument, Engels raises theoretically the very same question which every great revolution raises before us in practice, palpably and, what is more, on a scale of mass action, namely, the question of the relation between "special" bodies of armed men and the "self-acting armed organization of the population." We shall see how this question is concretely illustrated by the experience of the European and Russian revolutions.

¶10 But let us return to Engels' exposition.

He points out that sometimes, for example, in certain parts of North America, this public power is weak (he has in mind a rare exception in capitalist society, and those parts of North America in its pre-imperialist period where the free colonist predominated), but that, generally speaking, it grows stronger:

"It [the public power] grows stronger, however, in proportion as class contradictions within the state become more acute, and as adjacent states become larger and more populous. We have only to look at our present-day Europe, where class struggle and rivalry in conquest have tuned up the public power to such a pitch that it threatens to devour the whole of society and even the state."

¶11 This was written not later than the early nineties of the last century. Engels' last preface is dated June 16, 1891. The turn towards imperialism--meaning the complete domination of the trusts, meaning the omnipotence of the big banks, meaning a grand-scale colonial policy, and so forth--was only just beginning in France, and was even weaker in North America and in Germany. Since then "rivalry in conquest" has made gigantic strides--especially as, by the beginning of the second decade of the twentieth century, the whole globe had been completely divided up among these "rivals in conquest," i.e., among the great predatory powers.

¶3-4 How does the public power of the state differ from that of the archaic society? How does Engels differ in his thinking from the conventional? What are the chief instruments of force in the state power?

¶5-8. What view of the state did the opportunists take at the end of the 19th century, and why? What did they not understand? What is the effect of this view? To what split does Lenin refer? If it were possible, how would the "self-acting armed organization" of class society differ from that of earlier societies? Why is it impossible? What happens to the state power in revolutions? What do the oppressed classes do?

¶9-11. What theoretical question arises practically in every great revolution? Under what conditions is the state power weak, and what causes it to grow stronger? What was the turn toward imperialism? How did it affect the state?

¶12 Since then, military and naval armaments have grown incredibly and the predatory war of 1914-17 for the domination of the world by England or Germany, for the division of the spoils, has brought the "devouring" of all the forces of society by the rapacious state power close to complete catastrophe.

¶13 As early as 1891 Engels was able to point to "rivalry in conquest" as one of the most important distinguishing features of the foreign policy of the Great Powers, but in 1914-17, when this rivalry, many times intensified, has given rise to an imperialist war, the social-chauvinist scoundrels cover up the defence of the predatory interests of "their own" bourgeoisie with phrases about "defence of the fatherland," "defence of the republic and the revolution," etc.1

3. THE STATE AS AN INSTRUMENT FOR THE EXPLOITATION OF THE OPPRESSED CLASS

¶1 For the maintenance of the special public power standing above society, taxes and state loans are needed.

"In possession of the public power and the right to levy taxes," Engels writes, "the officials now stand, as organs of society, above society. The free, voluntary respect that was accorded to the organs of the gentile [clan] constitution does not satisfy them, even if they could gain it...." Special laws are enacted proclaiming the sanctity and inviolability of the officials. "The shabbiest police servant" has more "authority" than the representatives of the clan, but even the head of the military power of a civilized state may well envy the elder of a clan for the "unforced respect" of society.

¶2 Here the problem of the privileged position of the officials as organs of state power is raised. The main question indicated is: What is it that places them above society? We shall see how this theoretical question was answered in practice by the Paris Commune in 1871 and how it was slurred over in a reactionary manner by Kautsky in 1912.

¶3 "Because the state arose from the need to hold class antithesis in check, and because it arose, at the same time, in the midst of the conflict of these classes, it is, as a rule, the state of the most powerful, economically dominant class, which, through the medium of the state, becomes also the politically dominant class, and thus acquires new means of holding down and exploiting the oppressed class." Not only were the ancient and feudal states organs for the exploitation of the slaves and serfs, but "the modern representative state is an instrument of exploitation of wage labour by capital. By way of exception, however, periods occur in which the warring classes balance each other so nearly that the state power, as ostensible mediator, acquires, for the moment, a certain degree of independence of both." Such were the absolute monarchies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Bonapartism of the First and Second Empires in France, and the Bismarck regime in Germany.

¶4 Such, we may add, is the Kerensky government in republican Russia since the commencement of its persecution of the revolutionary proletariat, and at a moment when, owing to the leadership of the petty-bourgeois democrats, the Soviets have already become impotent, while the bourgeoisie is not yet strong enough simply to disperse them.

¶12-13. What happened to the military forces of the imperialist states? Where did it lead? What did Engels see in 1891? What did the social-chauvinists do in 1914-17?

§3 The State as an Instrument for the Exploitation of the Oppressed Class

¶1-2. How do taxes arise? What contrasts does Engels draw? What is the main question? How did the Paris Commune answer this question, and how did Kautsky treat it?

¶3-4. What class holds the state and why? To what end? What class antagonisms are mentioned? What exceptional condition can arise, and how? What examples does Lenin mention?

¶5 In a democratic republic, Engels continues, "wealth exercises its power indirectly, but all the more surely," first, by means of the "direct corruption of officials" (America); second, by means of "an alliance between the government and the Stock Exchange" (France and America).

¶6 At the present time, imperialism and the domination of the banks have "developed" into an extraordinarily fine art both these methods of upholding and giving effect to the omnipotence of wealth in democratic republics of all descriptions. If, for instance, in the very first months of the Russian democratic republic, one might say during the honeymoon of the "socialist" S.-R.'s and Mensheviks joined in wedlock to the bourgeoisie, Mr. Palchinsky, in the coalition government, sabotaged every measure intended for curbing the capitalists and their marauding practices, their plundering of the treasury by means of war contracts; and if later on Mr. Palchinsky, upon resigning from the cabinet (and being, of course, replaced by another quite similar Palchinsky), was "rewarded" by the capitalists with a lucrative job bringing in a salary of 120,000 rubles per annum, what would you call that? Direct or indirect bribery? An alliance between the government and the directors of syndicates, or "merely" friendly relations? What role do the Chernovs, Tseretelis, Avksentyevs and Skobelevs play? Are they the "direct" or only the indirect allies of the millionaire treasury-looters?

¶7 The reason why the omnipotence of "wealth" is more sure in a democratic republic is that it does not depend on a bad political shell of capitalism. A democratic republic is the best possible political shell for capitalism, and, therefore, once capital has grasped this very best shell (through the Palchinskys, Chernovs, Tseretelis and Co.), it establishes its power so securely, so surely, that no change, either of persons, of institutions, or of parties in the bourgeois democratic republic, can shake this power.

¶8 We must also note that Engels is most definite in calling universal suffrage an instrument of bourgeois rule. Universal suffrage, he says, obviously taking into account the long experience of German Social-Democracy, is "the gauge of the maturity of the working class. It cannot and never will be anything more in the present-day state...."

¶9 The petty-bourgeois democrats, such as our Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, and also their blood brothers, all the social-chauvinists and opportunists of Western Europe, expect just this "more" from universal suffrage. They themselves share and instil into the minds of the people the false idea that universal suffrage "in the present-day state" is really capable of ascertaining the will of the majority of the working people and of securing its realization.

¶10 Here we can only take note of this false idea, only point out that Engels' perfectly clear, precise and concrete statement is distorted at every step in the propaganda and agitation of the "official" (i.e., opportunist) socialist parties. A detailed exposure of the utter falsity of this idea which Engels brushes aside here is given in our further account of the views of Marx and Engels on the "present-day" state.

¶11 Engels gives a general summary of his views in the most widely read of his works in the following words:

"The state, then, has not existed from all eternity. There have been societies that did without it, that had no idea of the state and state power. At a certain stage of economic development, which was necessarily bound up with the split of society into classes, the state became a necessity owing to this split. We are now rapidly approaching a stage in the development of production at which the existence of these classes not only will have ceased to be a necessity, but will become a positive hindrance to production. They will fall as inevitably as they arose at an earlier stage. Along with them the state will inevitably fall. Society, which will reorganize production on the basis of a free and equal association of the producers, will put the whole machinery of state where it will then belong: into the museum of antiquities, by the side of the spinning-wheel and the bronze axe."

¶12 We do not often come across this passage in the propaganda and agitational literature of present-day Social-Democracy. But even when we do come across it, it is mostly quoted in the same manner as one bows before an icon, i.e., it is done to show official respect for Engels, and no attempt is made to gauge the breadth and depth of the revolution that this relegating of "the whole state machine to the museum of antiquities" presupposes. In most cases we do not even find an understanding of what Engels calls the state machine.

¶5-7. What is Engels' first point and what does it express? To what is an end put? What withers away? What transformation takes place? To what is it equivalent? What is excluded? In what period does the state wither away? What further withers away, and why?

¶8-10. Against whom did Engels argue first? Then whom? To what effect has history been written? How did the slogan of a "free people's state" originate? In what sense was Engels prepared to use it? Why is it an opportunist slogan? What is the "socialist criticism of the state" in general? What did Marx and Engels explain repeatedly?

¶11-12. What further argument does Engels make? Which idea do the opportunists drop from their agitation? What reservation does Lenin note? How does Engels characterize revolutionary violence? What does Herr Duhring say of revolutionary violence? How does Engels respond?

4. THE "WITHERING AWAY" OF THE STATE AND VIOLENT REVOLUTION

¶1 Engels' words regarding the "withering away" of the state are so widely known, they are so often quoted, and so clearly reveal the essence of the customary counterfeiting of Marxism into opportunism that we must deal with them in detail.

¶2 We shall quote the whole argument from which they are taken.

"The proletariat seizes state power and to begin with transforms the means of production into state property. But it thus puts an end to itself as proletariat, it thus puts an end to all class differences and class antagonisms, and thus also to the state as state. Moving in class antagonisms, society up to now had need of the state, that is, an organization of the exploiting class at each period for the maintenance of its external conditions of production, that is, particularly for the forcible holding down of the exploited class in the conditions of oppression (slavery, villeinage or serfdom, wage-labour) given by the existing mode of production. The state was the official representative of the whole of society, its concentration in a visible body, but it was so only in so far as it was the state of that class which in its time represented the whole of society: in antiquity, the state of the slave-owning citizens, in the Middle Ages, of the feudal nobility, in our time, of the bourgeois. When ultimately it becomes the-real representative of the whole of society, it renders itself superfluous. As soon as there is no social class to be held in subjection any longer, as soon as class domination and the struggle for individual existence based on the anarchy of production existing up to now are eliminated together with the collisions and excesses arising from them, there is nothing more to repress, nothing necessitating a special repressive force, a state. The first act in which the state really comes forward as the representative of the whole of society--the taking possession of the means of production in the name of society--is at the same time its last independent act as a state. The interference of the state power in social relations becomes superfluous in one sphere after another, and then dies away of itself. The government of persons is replaced by the administration of things and the direction of the processes of production. The state is not 'abolished,' it withers away. It is by this that one must evaluate the phrase 'a free people's state' with respect both to its temporary agitational justification and to its ultimate scientific inadequacy, and it is by this that we must also evaluate the demand of the so-called anarchists that the state should be abolished overnight." (Anti-Duhring. Herr Eugen Duhring's Revolution in Science, pp. 301-03, third German edition.)⁴

¶3 It may be said without fear of error that of this argument of Engels' which is so remarkably rich in ideas, only one point has become an integral part of socialist thought among modern socialist parties, namely, that according to Marx the state "wither away"--as distinct from the anarchist doctrine of the "abolition" of the state. To prune Marxism in such a manner is to reduce it to opportunism; for such an "interpretation" only leaves a vague notion of a slow, even, gradual change, of absence of leaps and storms, of absence of revolution. The current, widespread, mass, if one may say so, conception of the "withering away" of the state undoubtedly means slurring over, if not repudiating, revolution.

¶4 Such an "interpretation," however, is the crudest distortion of Marxism, advantageous only to the bourgeoisie; in point of theory, it is based on a disregard for the most important circumstances and considerations indicated, say, in Engels' "summary" argument which we have just quoted in full.

§4. The "Withering Away" of the State and Violent Revolution

¶1-2. How do the opportunists use Engels on the "withering away" of the state? With what does the proletariat begin after the seizure of state power? What part in production had the old state played? What does not happen? Why does the state become superfluous under the proletariat? What becomes of it? ¶3-4. What point do the opportunists take from Engels and how does Lenin criticize them? To whom is the opportunist "interpretation" advantageous? Why?

¶5 In the first place, at the very outset of his argument Engels says that, in seizing state power, the proletariat thereby "puts an end to the state as state." It is "not good form" to ponder over the meaning of this. Generally, it is either ignored altogether, or is considered to be something in the nature of a "Hegelian weakness" on Engels' part. As a matter of fact, however, these words briefly express the experience of one of the greatest proletarian revolutions, the Paris Commune of 1871, of which we shall speak in greater detail in its proper place. As a matter of fact, Engels speaks here of the proletarian revolution "putting an end to" the bourgeois state, while the words "withering away" refer to the remnants of the proletarian state system after the socialist revolution. According to Engels, the bourgeois state does not "wither away," but the proletariat "puts an end to" it in the course of the revolution. What withers away after this revolution is the proletarian state or semi-state.

¶6 Secondly, the state is a "special repressive force." Engels gives this splendid and extremely profound definition here with the utmost lucidity. And from it follows that the "special repressive force" for the suppression of the proletariat by the bourgeoisie, of millions of the working people by handfuls of the rich, must be replaced by a "special repressive force" for the suppression of the bourgeoisie by the proletariat (the dictatorship of the proletariat). This is precisely what is meant by "putting an end to the state as state." This is precisely the "act" of taking possession of the means of production in the name of society. And it is self-evident that such a replacement of one (bourgeois) "special force" by another (proletarian) "special force" cannot possibly take place in the form of "withering away."

¶7 Thirdly, in speaking of "withering away," and the even more graphic and colorful "dying away of itself," Engels refers quite clearly and definitely to the period after the state has taken possession of the means of production in the name of the whole of society, that is, after the socialist revolution. We all know that the political form of the "state" at that time is the most complete democracy. But it never enters the head of any of the opportunists who shamelessly distort Marxism that Engels is consequently speaking here of democracy "dying away of itself," or "withering away." This seems very strange at first sight; but it is "incomprehensible" only to those who have not pondered over the fact that democracy is also a state and that, consequently, democracy will also disappear when the state disappears. Revolution alone can "put an end to" the bourgeois state. The state in general, i.e., the most complete democracy, can only "wither away."

¶8 Fourthly, after formulating his famous proposition that "the state withers away," Engels at once explains specifically that this proposition is directed against both the opportunists and the anarchists. In doing this Engels puts in the forefront that conclusion drawn from the proposition concerning the withering away of the state which is directed against the opportunists.

¶9 One can wager that out of every 10,000 persons who have read or heard about the "withering away" of the state, 9,990 are completely unaware, or do not remember, that Engels directed his conclusions from this proposition not against the anarchists alone. And of the remaining ten, probably nine do not know the meaning of a "free people's state" or why an attack on this slogan means an attack on the opportunists. This is how history is written! This is how a great revolutionary teaching is imperceptibly falsified and adapted to prevailing philistinism. The conclusion directed against the anarchists has been repeated thousands of times, vulgarized, rammed into people's heads in the shallowest form and has acquired the strength of a prejudice; whereas the conclusion directed against the opportunists has been slurred over and "forgotten"!

¶10 The "free people's state" was a programmatic demand and a widely current slogan of the German Social-Democrats in the 1870s. This slogan is devoid of all political content except that it describes the concept of democracy in pompous philistine fashion. In so far as it hinted in a legally permissible manner at a democratic republic, Engels was prepared to "justify" its "temporary" use from an agitational point of view. But it was an opportunist slogan; for it expressed not only an embellishment of bourgeois democracy, but also failure to understand the socialist criticism of the state in general. We are in favor of a democratic republic as the best form of the state for the proletariat under capitalism; but we have no right to forget that wage slavery is the lot of the people even in the most democratic bourgeois republic. Furthermore, every state is a "special repressive force" against the oppressed class. Consequently, every state is not "free" and not a "people's state." Marx and Engels explained this repeatedly to their party comrades in the seventies.

¶5-7. What is Engels' first point and what does it express? To what is an end put? What withers away? What transformation takes place? To what is it equivalent? What is excluded? In what period does the state wither away? What further withers away, and why?

¶8-10. Against whom did Engels argue first? Then whom? To what effect has history been written? How did the slogan of a "free people's state" originate? In what sense was Engels prepared to use it? Why is it an opportunist slogan? What is the "socialist criticism of the state" in general? What did Marx and Engels explain repeatedly?

¶11 Fifthly, this very same work of Engels', from which everyone remembers the argument about the withering away of the state, contains an argument on the significance of violent revolution. With Engels, the historical analysis of its role becomes a veritable panegyric on violent revolution. This "no one remembers"; it is not good form in modern socialist parties to talk or even think about the significance of this idea, and it plays no part whatever in their daily propaganda and agitation among the masses. And yet, it is inseparably bound up with the "withering away" of the state into one harmonious whole. Here is Engels' argument:

¶12 "That force, however, plays yet another role [other than that of evil-doing] in history, a revolutionary role; that, in the words of Marx, it is the midwife of every old society pregnant with a new one, that it is the instrument by means of which social movement forces its way through and shatters the dead, fossilized political forms--of this there is not a word in Herr Dühring. It is only with sighs and groans that he admits the possibility that force will perhaps be necessary for the overthrow of the economy based on exploitation--alas! because all use of force, forsooth, demoralizes the person who uses it. And this in spite of the immense moral and spiritual advance which has been the result of every victorious revolution! And this too in Germany, where a violent collision--which may after all be forced on the people--would at least have the advantage of wiping out the servility which has penetrated the national consciousness as a result of the humiliation of the 'Thirty Years' War. It is this preachers' mentality, dull, insipid and impotent, that claims the right to impose itself on the most revolutionary party history has known!" (P. 193, third German edition, Part II, end of Chap. IV.)

¶13 How can this panegyric on violent revolution, which Engels insistently brought to the attention of the German Social Democrats between 1878 and 1894, i.e., right up to the time of his death, be combined with the theory of the "withering away" of the state to form a single doctrine?

¶14 Usually the two are combined by means of eclecticism, by an unprincipled or sophistic selection made arbitrarily (or to please the powers that be) of now one, now another argument, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, if not more often, it is the idea of the "withering away" that is placed in the forefront. Dialectics is replaced by eclecticism--this is the most usual, the most widespread phenomenon to be met with in present-day official Social-Democratic literature in relation to Marxism. This sort of substitution is, of course, nothing new; it was observed even in the history of classic Greek philosophy. In falsifying Marxism in opportunist fashion, the substitution of eclecticism for dialectics is the easiest way of deceiving the masses. It gives an illusory satisfaction; it seems to take into account all sides of the process, all tendencies of development, all the conflicting influences, and so forth, whereas in reality it provides no integral and revolutionary understanding of the process of social development at all.

¶15 We have already said above, and shall show more fully later, that the teaching of Marx and Engels concerning the inevitability of a violent revolution refers to the bourgeois state. The latter cannot be superseded by the proletarian state (the dictatorship of the proletariat) through the process of "withering away," but, as a general rule, only through a violent revolution. The panegyric which Engels sang in its honor, and which fully corresponds to Marx's repeated declarations (recall the concluding passages of *The Poverty of Philosophy*⁵ and The Communist Manifesto,⁶ with their proud and open proclamation of the inevitability of a violent revolution; recall what Marx wrote nearly thirty years later, in criticizing the Gotha Programme of 1875,⁷ when he mercilessly castigated the opportunist character of that programme)--this panegyric is by no means a mere "access of enthusiasm," a mere declamation or a polemical sally. The necessity of systematically educating the masses in this and precisely this view of violent revolution lies at the root of the entire teaching of Marx and Engels. The betrayal of their teaching by the now predominant social-chauvinist and Kautskyite trends finds particularly striking expression in the neglect of such propaganda and agitation by both these trends.

¶16 The supersession of the bourgeois state by the proletarian state is impossible without a violent revolution. Doing away with the proletarian state, i.e., with the state in general, is impossible except through "withering away."

¶17 A detailed and concrete elaboration of these views was given by Marx and Engels when they studied each separate revolutionary situation, when they analyzed the lessons of the experience of each individual revolution. We shall now pass to this, undoubtedly the most important, part of their teaching.

¶11-12. What further argument does Engels make? Which idea do the opportunists drop from their agitation? What reservation does Lenin note? How does Engels characterize revolutionary violence? What does Herr Dühring say of revolutionary violence? How does Engels respond?

¶13-14. What problem is noted by Lenin? How is this problem approached by the opportunists? What do they put in the forefront? What is the advantage to them? What is the semblance of the opportunist approach, and what is the reality?

¶15-17. How can the bourgeois state be superseded, and how not? What did Marx say? What lies at the root of the entire teaching of Marx and Engels? What is impossible without revolutionary violence? What is impossible without "withering away?" By what means did Marx and Engels reach their conclusions?

CHAPTER II THE STATE AND REVOLUTION. THE EXPERIENCE OF 1848-51

1. THE EVE OF THE REVOLUTION

¶1 The first works of mature Marxism--The Poverty of Philosophy and The Communist Manifesto--appeared just on the eve of the revolution of 1848. Because of this, in addition to presenting the general principles of Marxism, they reflect to a certain degree the concrete revolutionary situation of the time. Hence, it will be more appropriate, perhaps, to examine what the authors of these works said about the state immediately before they drew conclusions from the experience of the years 1848-51.

¶2 In The Poverty of Philosophy Marx wrote:

"The working class, in the course of its development, will substitute for the old bourgeois society an association which will exclude classes and their antagonism, and there will be no more political power properly so-called, since political power is precisely the official expression of class antagonism in bourgeois society." (P. 182, German edition, 1885.)⁸

¶3 It is instructive to compare this general exposition of the idea of the state disappearing after the abolition of classes with the exposition contained in The Communist Manifesto, written by Marx and Engels a few months later--to be exact, in November 1847:

"In depicting the most general phases of the development of the proletariat, we traced the more or less veiled civil war, raging within existing society, up to the point where that war breaks out into open revolution, and where the violent overthrow of the bourgeoisie lays the foundation for the sway of the proletariat." "We have seen above, that the first step in the revolution by the working class, is to raise the proletariat to the position of ruling class, to win the battle of democracy. "The proletariat will use its political supremacy to wrest, by degrees, all capital from the bourgeoisie, to centralize all instruments of production in the hands of the state, i.e., of the proletariat organized as the ruling class; and to increase the total of productive forces as rapidly as possible." (Pp. 31 and 37, seventh German edition, 1906.)⁹

¶4 Here we have a formulation of one of the most remarkable and most important ideas of Marxism on the subject of the state, namely, the idea of the "dictatorship of the proletariat" (as Marx and Engels began to call it after the Paris Commune); and then a supremely interesting definition of the state which is also one of the "forgotten words" of Marxism: "the state, i.e., the proletariat organized as the ruling class."

¶5 This definition of the state has never been explained in the prevailing propaganda and agitational literature of the official Social-Democratic parties. More than that, it has been deliberately forgotten, for it is absolutely irreconcilable with reformism, and is a slap in the face of the common opportunist prejudices and philistine illusions about the "peaceful development of democracy."

¶6 The proletariat needs the state--this is repeated by all the opportunists, social-chauvinists and Kautskyites, who assure us that this is what Marx taught. But they "forget" to add that, in the first place, according to Marx, the proletariat needs only a state which is withering away, i.e., a state so constituted that it begins to wither away immediately, and cannot but wither away. And, secondly, the working people need a "state, i.e., the proletariat organized as the ruling class."

¶7 The state is a special organization of force; it is an organization of violence for the suppression of some class. What class must the proletariat suppress? Naturally, only the exploiting class, i.e., the bourgeoisie. The working people need a state only to suppress the resistance of the exploiters, and only the proletariat is in a position to direct this suppression and carry it out; for the proletariat is the only class that is consistently revolutionary, the only class able to unite all the working and exploited people in the struggle against the bourgeoisie, in completely displacing it.

¶8 The exploiting classes need political rule in order to maintain exploitation, i.e., in the selfish interests of an insignificant minority, against the vast majority of the people. The exploited classes need political rule in order completely to abolish all exploitation, i.e., in the interests of the vast majority of the people, against the insignificant minority consisting of the modern slave-owners--the landlords and the capitalists.

Chapter II. The State and Revolution. The Experience of 1848-51.

§1. The Eve of the Revolution
¶1-3. When did the first works of mature Marxism appear? What did Marx mean by "no more political power?" Into what does the "more or less veiled civil war" break out? What is the first step in the revolution of the proletariat? To what use will the proletariat put its political supremacy?

¶4-6. How does Lenin characterize this formulation? What does he call a "definition of the state?" How did the Social Democratic parties treat this definition? What two things do the opportunists "forget" about the state?

¶7-8. Who must the working people suppress? Who alone can direct the state, and why only them? What is the difference between the bourgeois state and the proletarian state?

¶9 The petty-bourgeois democrats, those alleged socialists who have replaced class struggle by dreams of class harmony, even pictured the socialist transformation in a dreamy fashion--not as the overthrow of the rule of the exploiting class, but as the peaceful submission of the minority to the majority which has become aware of its aims. This petty-bourgeois utopia, which is inseparably connected with the idea of the state being above classes, led in practice to the betrayal of the interests of the toiling classes, as was shown, for example, by the history of the French revolutions of 1848 and 1871, and by the experience of "socialist" participation in bourgeois cabinets in England, France, Italy and other countries at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries.

¶10 Marx fought all his life against this petty-bourgeois socialism--now resurrected in Russia by the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik parties. He developed his teaching on the class struggle consistently, down to the teaching on political power, on the state.

¶11 The overthrow of bourgeois rule can be accomplished only by the proletariat, as the particular class whose economic conditions of existence prepare it for this task and provide it with the possibility and the strength to perform it. While the bourgeoisie breaks up and disintegrates the peasantry and all the petty-bourgeois strata, it welds together, unites and organizes the proletariat. Only the proletariat--by virtue of the economic role it plays in large-scale production--is capable of being the leader of all the working and exploited masses, whom the bourgeoisie exploits, oppresses and crushes often not less, but more, than it does the proletarians, but who are incapable of waging an independent struggle for their emancipation.

¶12 The teaching on the class struggle, applied by Marx to the question of the state and of the socialist revolution, leads of necessity to the recognition of the political rule of the proletariat, of its dictatorship, i.e., of power undivided with anyone else and relying directly upon the armed force of the masses. The overthrow of the bourgeoisie can be achieved only by transformation of the proletariat into the ruling class, capable of crushing the inevitable and desperate resistance of the bourgeoisie, and of organizing all the working and exploited masses for the new economic order.

¶13 The proletariat needs state power, the centralized organization of force, the organization of violence, both to crush the resistance of the exploiters and to lead the enormous mass of the population--the peasantry, the petty bourgeoisie, and semi-proletarians--in the work of organizing socialist economy.

¶14 By educating the workers' party, Marxism educates the vanguard of the proletariat which is capable of taking power and of leading the whole people to socialism, of orienting and organizing the new order, of being the teacher, the guide, the leader of all the working and exploited people in the task of building up their social life without the bourgeoisie and against the bourgeoisie. By contrast, the opportunism which now holds sway trains, from among the membership of the workers' party, representatives of the better-paid workers, who lose touch with the masses, "get along" fairly well under capitalism, and sell their birthright for a mess of pottage, i.e., renounce their role as revolutionary leaders of the people against the bourgeoisie.

¶15 "The state, i.e., the proletariat organized as the ruling class," this theory of Marx is inseparably bound up with all he taught on the revolutionary role of the proletariat in history. The culmination of this role is the proletarian dictatorship, the political rule of the proletariat.

¶16 But if the proletariat needs the state as a special form of organization of violence against the bourgeoisie, the following conclusion suggests itself: Is it conceivable that such an organization can be created without first destroying, demolishing the state machine created by the bourgeoisie for itself? The Communist Manifesto leads straight to this conclusion, and it is of this conclusion that Marx speaks when summing up the experience of the revolution of 1848-51.

¶9-11. Of what do the petty bourgeois democrats dream? On what is this dream based? To what did it lead in practice? What was Marx' attitude? Why is the proletariat the only class able to overthrow bourgeois rule? What happens to all other strata? What economic aspect of the proletariat does Lenin mention? Who must the proletariat lead?
¶12-13. To what conclusions of the political rule of the proletariat does Marxism lead? On what does working class rule depend? What must the proletariat do as the working class? Why does the proletariat need state power?
¶14-16. What are the tasks of the workers' party? What do the opportunists do instead? What idea is inseparably part of all Marx taught? What arises from the Marxist theory of the state?

2. THE REVOLUTION SUMMED UP

¶1 Marx sums up his conclusions from the revolution of 1848-51, on the question of the state we are concerned with, in the following argument contained in The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte:

"But the revolution is thoroughgoing. It is still journeying through purgatory. It does its work methodically. By December 2, 1851 [the day of Louis Bonaparte's coup d'etat], it had completed one half of its preparatory work. It is now completing the other half. First it perfected the parliamentary power, in order to be able to overthrow it. Now that it has attained this, it is perfecting the executive power, reducing it to its purest expression, isolating it, setting it up against itself as the sole reproach, in order to concentrate all its forces of destruction against it [italics ours]. And when it has done this second half of its preliminary work, Europe will leap from its seat and exultantly exclaim: Well grubbed, old mole!

"This executive power with its enormous bureaucratic and military organization, with its vast and ingenious state machinery, with a host of officials numbering half a million, besides an army of another half million, this appalling parasitic body, which enmeshes the body of French society and chokes all its pores, sprang up in the days of the absolute monarchy, with the decay of the feudal system, which it helped to hasten." The first French Revolution developed centralization, "but at the same time" it increased "the extent, the attributes and the number of agents of governmental power. Napoleon completed this state machinery. The Legitimist monarchy and the July monarchy added nothing but a greater division of labour. . . Finally, in its struggle against the revolution, the parliamentary republic found itself compelled to strengthen, along with the repressive measures, the resources and centralization of governmental power. All revolutions perfected this machine instead of smashing it [italics ours]. The parties that contended in turn for domination regarded the possession of this huge state edifice as the principal spoils of the victor." (The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, pp. 98-99, fourth edition, Hamburg, 1907.)¹⁰

¶2 In this remarkable argument Marxism takes a tremendous step forward compared with The Communist Manifesto. In the latter, the question of the state is still put in an extremely abstract manner, in the most general terms and expressions. In the above-quoted passage, the question is put concretely and the conclusion is extremely precise, definite, and palpable in practice: all previous revolutions perfected the state machine, but it must be broken up, smashed.

¶3 This conclusion is the chief and fundamental point in the Marxist teaching on the state. And it is precisely this fundamental point which has been not only completely forgotten by the dominant official Social-Democratic parties, but distorted outright (as we shall see later) by the most prominent theoretician of the Second International, K. Kautsky.

¶4 The Communist Manifesto gives a general summary of history, which compels us to regard the state as the organ of class rule and leads us to the inevitable conclusion that the proletariat cannot overthrow the bourgeoisie without first conquering political power, without attaining political supremacy, without transforming the state into the "proletariat organized as the ruling class"; and that this proletarian state will begin to wither away immediately after its victory, because the state is unnecessary and cannot exist in a society in which there are no class contradictions. The question as to how, from the point of view of historical development, the replacement of the bourgeois state by the proletarian state is to take place is not raised here.

¶5 This is the question Marx raises and answers in 1852. True to his philosophy of dialectical materialism, Marx takes as his basis the historical experience of the great years of revolution, 1848 to 1851. Here, as everywhere, his teaching is a summing up of experience, illuminated by a profound philosophical conception of the world and a rich knowledge of history.

§2. The Revolution Summed Up

¶1. What did the bourgeois revolution accomplish first? What did it do next? What political effect follows? What are the divisions of the French state and when did they originate? How did the first French revolution (1789-99) affect the state? What was the parliamentary government forced to do, and why? What was the outcome of all the previous revolutions? What was the attitude toward the state of the contending parties?

¶2-3. What step forward does Marx take here? What is the significance to Marxism of this point? How do the Social Democratic parties treat it? How does their most prominent theoretician treat this point?

¶4-5. What summary is given in the Communist Manifesto? What question does it not raise? Why did Marx raise and answer this question only later? What aspects of his teaching does Lenin mention?

¶6 The problem of the state is put concretely: How did the bourgeois state, the state machine necessary for the rule of the bourgeoisie, come into being historically? What changes did it undergo, how did it evolve in the course of the bourgeois revolutions and in the face of the independent actions of the oppressed classes? What are the tasks of the proletariat in relation to this state machine?

¶7 The centralized state power that is peculiar to bourgeois society came into being in the period of the fall of absolutism. Two institutions are most characteristic of this state machine: the bureaucracy and the standing army. In their works, Marx and Engels repeatedly show that it is the bourgeoisie with whom these institutions are connected by thousands of threads. The experience of every worker illustrates this connection in an extremely graphic and impressive manner. From its own bitter experience, the working class learns to recognize this connection; that is why it so easily grasps and so firmly learns the science which shows the inevitability of this connection, a science which the petty-bourgeois democrats either ignorantly and flippantly deny, or, still more flippantly, admit "in general," while forgetting to draw the corresponding practical conclusions.

¶8 The bureaucracy and the standing army are a "parasite" on the body of bourgeois society--a parasite born of the internal contradictions which rend that society, but a parasite which "chokes" all its vital pores. The Kautskyite opportunism now dominating official Social-Democracy considers the view that the state is a parasitic organism to be the peculiar and exclusive attribute of anarchism. It goes without saying that this distortion of Marxism is of extreme advantage to those philistines who have reduced socialism to the unheard-of disgrace of justifying and embellishing the imperialist war by applying to it the concept of "defence of the fatherland"; but it is unquestionably a distortion, nevertheless.

¶9 The development, perfecting and strengthening of this bureaucratic and military apparatus proceeded during all the numerous bourgeois revolutions which Europe has witnessed since the fall of feudalism. In particular, it is precisely the petty bourgeoisie that is attracted to the side of the big bourgeoisie and is largely subordinated to it through this apparatus, which provides the upper strata of the peasantry, small artisans, tradesmen and the like with comparatively comfortable, quiet and respectable jobs raising their holders above the people. Consider what happened in Russia during the six months following February 27, 1917. The official posts which formerly were given by preference to members of the Black Hundreds have now become the spoils of the Cadets, Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries. Nobody has really thought of introducing any serious reforms; every effort has been made to put them off "until the Constituent Assembly," and to steadily put off the Constituent Assembly until the end of the war! But there has been no delay, no waiting for the Constituent Assembly in the division of the spoils, in getting the lucrative jobs of ministers, vice-ministers, governors-general, etc., etc. ! The game of combinations with regard to the composition of the government has been, in essence, only an expression of this division and redivision of the "spoils," which has been going on high and low, throughout the country, in every department of central and local government. The six months between February 27 and August 27, 1917, can be summed up, objectively summed up beyond all dispute, as follows: reforms shelved, distribution of official jobs accomplished and "mistakes" in the distribution corrected by a few redistributions.

¶10 But the more the bureaucratic apparatus is "redistributed" among the various bourgeois and petty-bourgeois parties (among the Cadets, Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks in the case of Russia), the more clearly the oppressed classes, and the proletariat at their head, become conscious of their irreconcilable hostility to the whole of bourgeois society. That is why it becomes necessary for all bourgeois parties, even for the most democratic and "revolutionary-democratic" among them, to intensify repressive measures against the revolutionary proletariat, to strengthen the apparatus of repression, i.e., that same state machine. This course of events compels the revolution "to concentrate all its forces of destruction" against the state power, and to set itself the task, not of improving the state machine, but of demolishing and destroying it.

¶6-8. How does Marx put the question of the state? When did the bourgeois state power arise and what institutions are most characteristic of it? How do the workers learn of the connection between the bourgeoisie and the state? How do the workers compare to the petty bourgeois democrats? How do the Kautskyites look at the parasitism of the bourgeois state? What further distortion of Marxism do they perpetrate? ¶9-10. What class is attracted to the bourgeoisie through the state apparatus, and how? What happened in Russia after February of 1917 [i.e., the fall of the tsar]? What did the opportunists delay, and what did they not delay? How does Lenin sum the process up? What effect does this have on the oppressed classes? How do the bourgeoisie and the opportunists respond? What must the revolution do?

¶11 It was not logical reasoning, but the actual development of events, the living experience of 1848-51, that led to the task being presented in this way. The extent to which Marx held strictly to the ground of actual historical experience can be seen from the fact that, in 1852, he did not yet concretely raise the question of what was to take the place of the state machine that was to be destroyed. Experience had not yet provided material for the solution of this problem which history placed on the order of the day later on, in 1871. In 1852 all that could be established with the accuracy of scientific observation was that the proletarian revolution had approached the task of "concentrating all its forces of destruction" against the state power, of "smashing" the state machine.

¶12 Here the question may arise: Is it correct to generalize the experience, observations and conclusions of Marx, to apply them to a field that is wider than the history of France during the three years 1848-51? Before proceeding to deal with this question, let us first recall a remark made by Engels, and then examine the facts. In his preface to the third edition of The Eighteenth Brumaire Engels wrote:

"France is the land where, more than anywhere else, the historical class struggles were each time fought out to a decision, and where, consequently, the changing political forms within which they move and in which their results are summarized have been stamped in the sharpest outlines. The center of feudalism in the Middle Ages, the model country of unified monarchy, resting on estates, since the Renaissance, France demolished feudalism in the Great Revolution and established the unalloyed rule of the bourgeoisie in a classical purity unequalled by any other European land. And the struggle of the upward striving proletariat against the ruling bourgeoisie appeared here in an acute form unknown elsewhere." (P. 4, 1907 edition.)

¶13 The last sentence is out of date, inasmuch as since 1871 a lull has set in in the revolutionary struggle of the French proletariat; although, long as this lull may be, it does not at all preclude the possibility that, in the coming proletarian revolution, France may show herself to be the classic land of the class struggle to a finish.

¶14 Let us, however, cast a general glance over the history of the advanced countries at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries. We shall see that the same process has been going on more slowly, in more varied forms, in a much wider field: on the one hand, the development of "parliamentary power" both in the republican countries (France, America, Switzerland) and in the monarchies (England, Germany to a certain extent, Italy, the Scandinavian countries, etc.); on the other hand, a struggle for power among the various bourgeois and petty-bourgeois parties which distributed and redistributed the "spoils" of office, while the foundations of the bourgeois system remained unchanged; and, finally, the perfection and consolidation of the "executive power," its bureaucratic and military apparatus.

¶15 There is not the slightest doubt that these features are common to the whole of the modern evolution of the capitalist states in general. In the three years 1848-51 France displayed, in a swift, sharp, concentrated form, the very same processes of development which are characteristic of the whole capitalist world.

¶16 Imperialism--the era of bank capital, the era of gigantic capitalist monopolies, the era of the development of monopoly capitalism into state-monopoly capitalism--has demonstrated with particular force an extraordinary strengthening of the "state machine" and an unprecedented growth of its bureaucratic and military apparatus, in connection with the intensification of repression against the proletariat both in the monarchical and in the freest, republican countries.

¶17 World history is now undoubtedly leading, on an incomparably larger scale than in 1852, to the "concentration of all the forces" of the proletarian revolution on the "destruction" of the state machine.

¶18 What the proletariat will put in its place is indicated by the extremely instructive material furnished by the Paris Commune.

¶11-13. Why did Marx present the tasks of the proletariat as he did? What question did he not answer in 1852? Why not? What could be concluded in 1851, and how? What question arises? What does Engels observe of France? What qualification does Lenin note?
¶14-15. What does Lenin find in a general glance at the advanced countries? What does he conclude of these features? What relation does he see between France in 1848-51 and the whole capitalist world?
¶16-18. How does imperialism stand politically in relation to the earlier period? Where is world history leading? Where does Lenin look to find material for the proletarian tasks?

3. THE PRESENTATION OF THE QUESTION BY MARX IN 1852

(Added to the second edition)

¶1 In 1907 Mehring published, in the Neue Zeit 11 (Vol. XXV, 2, p. 164), extracts from a letter by Marx to Weydemeyer dated March 5, 1852. This letter contains, among other things, the following remarkable observation:

"And now as to myself, no credit is due to me for discovering the existence of classes in modern society, nor yet the struggle between them. Long before me bourgeois historians had described the historical development of this struggle of the classes, and bourgeois economists the economic anatomy of the classes. What I did that was new was to prove: (1) that the existence of classes is only bound up with particular historical phases in the development of production [historische Entwicklungsphasen der Produktion]; (2) that the class struggle necessarily leads to the dictatorship of the proletariat; (3) that this dictatorship itself only constitutes the transition to the abolition of all classes and to a classless society."¹²

¶2 In these words Marx succeeded in expressing with striking clarity, firstly, the chief and radical difference between his teaching and that of the foremost and most profound thinkers of the bourgeoisie, and, secondly, the essence of his teaching on the state.

¶3 It is often said and written that the main point in Marx's teachings is the class struggle. But this is not true. And from this-untruth very often springs the opportunist distortion of Marxism, its falsification in a spirit that makes it acceptable to the bourgeoisie. For the doctrine of the class struggle was created not by Marx, but by the bourgeoisie before Marx, and generally speaking it is acceptable to the bourgeoisie. He who recognizes only the class struggle is not yet a Marxist; it may turn out that he has not yet gone beyond the bounds of bourgeois thinking and bourgeois politics. To confine Marxism to the doctrine of the class struggle means curtailing Marxism, distorting it, reducing it to something acceptable to the bourgeoisie. Only he is a Marxist who extends the recognition of the class struggle to the recognition of the dictatorship of the proletariat. This is what constitutes the most profound difference between the Marxist and the ordinary petty (as well as big) bourgeois. This is the touchstone on which the real understanding and recognition of Marxism is to be tested. And it is not surprising that when the history of Europe brought the working class face to face with this question as a practical issue, not only all the opportunists and reformists, but all the "Kautskyites" (people who vacillate between reformism and Marxism) proved to be miserable philistines and petty-bourgeois democrats who repudiate the dictatorship of the proletariat. Kautsky's pamphlet, The Dictatorship of the Proletariat, published in August 1918, i.e., long after the first edition of the present book, is a perfect example of petty-bourgeois distortion of Marxism and base renunciation of it in practice, while hypocritically recognizing it in words (see my pamphlet, The Proletarian Revolution and the Renegade Kautsky, Petrograd and Moscow, 1918).

¶4 Present-day opportunism in the person of its principal representative, the ex-Marxist, K. Kautsky, fits in completely with Marx's characterization of the bourgeois position quoted above, for this opportunism limits the recognition of the class struggle to the sphere of bourgeois relations. (Within this sphere, within its framework, not a single educated liberal will refuse to recognize the class struggle "in principle"! Opportunism does not extend the recognition of the class struggle precisely to what is most important, to the period of transition from capitalism to communism, to the period of the overthrow and the complete abolition of the bourgeoisie. In reality, this period inevitably is a period of an unprecedentedly fierce class struggle in unprecedentedly acute forms and, consequently, during this period the state must inevitably be a state that is democratic in a new way (for the proletariat and the propertyless in general) and dictatorial in a new way (against the bourgeoisie).

¶5 To proceed. The essence of Marx's teaching on the state has been mastered only by those who understand that the dictatorship of a single class is necessary not only for every class society in general, not only for the proletariat which has overthrown the bourgeoisie, but also for the entire historical period which separates capitalism from "classless society," from communism. The forms of bourgeois states are extremely varied, but their essence is the same: all these states, whatever their form, in the final analysis are inevitably the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie. The transition from capitalism to communism certainly cannot but yield a tremendous abundance and variety of political forms, but the essence will inevitably be the same: the dictatorship of the proletariat.

§3. The Presentation of the Question by Marx in 1852

¶1-2. Did Marx discover the class struggle? What had the bourgeois historians described and when? What is new with Marx? What does Lenin note?

¶3. What mistake on Marx's teachings is very common? Why do the bourgeoisie find the idea of the class struggle acceptable? What are the effects of confining Marxism to the class struggle? Only who is a Marxist? Why? How do the opportunists treat this question? (What is a "Kautskyite?") Of what is Kautsky's pamphlet an example?

¶4-5. Where does Kautsky stand on Marx? What does opportunism not recognize? What is characteristic of the transition period? What follows concerning the state? For what period is the dictatorship of the proletariat necessary? What is the relation between the form and the content of the bourgeois state? What follows for the proletarian state?

CHAPTER III

THE STATE AND REVOLUTION. THE EXPERIENCE OF THE PARIS COMMUNE OF 1871. MARX'S ANALYSIS

1. WHEREIN LAY THE HEROISM OF THE COMMUNARDS' ATTEMPT?

¶1 It is well known that in the autumn of 1870, a few months before the Commune, Marx warned the Paris workers, proving to them that any attempt to overthrow the government would be a desperate folly. But when, in March 1871, a decisive battle was forced upon the workers and they accepted it, when the uprising had become a fact, Marx greeted the proletarian revolution with the greatest enthusiasm, in spite of unfavorable auguries. Marx did not assume the rigidly pedantic attitude of condemning an "untimely" movement as did the dismal-famed Russian renegade from Marxism, Plekhanov, who, in November 1905, wrote encouragingly about the workers' and peasants' struggle, but after December 1905 cried, liberal fashion: "They should not have taken up arms."

¶2 Marx, however, was not only enthusiastic about the heroism of the Communards, "storming Heaven," as he expressed it. Although the mass revolutionary movement did not achieve its aim, he saw in it a historic experiment of enormous importance, a certain advance of the world proletarian revolution, a practical step more important than hundreds of programmes and arguments. To analyze this experiment, to draw tactical lessons from it, to re-examine his theory in the light of it—that was the task that Marx set himself.

¶3 The only "correction" Marx thought it necessary to make in The Communist Manifesto, he made on the basis of the revolutionary experience of the Paris Communards.

¶4 The last preface to the new German edition of The Communist Manifesto, signed by both its authors, is dated June 24, 1872. In this preface the authors, Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, say that the programme of The Communist Manifesto "has in places become antiquated," and they go on to say:

*"One thing especially was proved by the Commune, viz., that 'the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery, and wield it for its own purposes.'"*¹³

¶5 The authors took the words that are in single quotation marks in this passage from Marx's book, The Civil War in France.

¶6 Thus, Marx and Engels regarded one principal and fundamental lesson of the Paris Commune as being of such enormous importance that they introduced it as a substantial correction into The Communist Manifesto.

¶7 It is extremely characteristic that precisely this substantial correction has been distorted by the opportunists, and that its meaning is probably unknown to nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine hundredths, of the readers of The Communist Manifesto. We shall deal with this distortion more fully further on, in a chapter devoted specially to distortions. Here it will be sufficient to note that the current, vulgar "interpretation" of Marx's famous dictum just quoted is that Marx here allegedly emphasizes the idea of slow development in contradistinction to the seizure of power, and so on.

¶8 As a matter of fact, exactly the opposite is the case. Marx's idea is that the working class must break up, smash the "ready-made state machinery," and not confine itself simply to seizing it.

¶9 On April 12, 1871, i.e., just at the time of the Commune, Marx wrote to Kugelmann:

"If you look at the last chapter of my Eighteenth Brumaire, you will find that I declare that the next attempt of the French Revolution will be no longer, as before, to transfer the bureaucratic-military machine from one hand to another, but to smash it [Marx's italics--the original is "zerbrechen"], and this is the preliminary condition for every real people's revolution on the Continent. And this is what our heroic Party comrades in Paris are attempting." (Neue Zeit, Vol. XX, I, 1901-02, p. 709.)¹⁴; (The letters of Marx to Kugelmann have appeared in Russian in no less than two editions, one of which I edited and supplied with a preface.¹⁵)

¶10 The words, "to smash the bureaucratic-military machine," briefly express the principal lesson of Marxism regarding the tasks of the proletariat during a revolution in relation to the state. And it is precisely this lesson that has been not only completely forgotten, but distorted outright by the prevailing, Kautskyite, "interpretation" of Marxism!

¶11 As for Marx's reference to The Eighteenth Brumaire, we have quoted the relevant passage in full above.

Ch. III The State and Revolution. The Experience of the Paris Commune of 1871. Marx's Analysis

§1. Wherein Lay the Heroism of the Communards' Attempt?

¶1-2. How did the battle of March, 1871 in Paris come about? How did Marx respond to it? What tasks did Marx set himself?

¶3-6. On what basis did Marx make a "correction" to the Communist Manifesto? What did Marx and Engels say? How highly did Marx and Engels regard this lesson of the Commune?

¶7-11. How do the opportunists distort Marx on the Commune? What is Marx' idea? What had Marx anticipated in his Eighteenth Brumaire? What did the Paris workers attempt? What is the principle task of the workers in relation to the state during a revolution? How do the Kautskyites treat this lesson of Marxism?

¶12 It is interesting to note, in particular, two points in the above-quoted argument of Marx. First, he confines his conclusion to the Continent. This was understandable in 1871, when England was still the model of a purely capitalist country, but without a militarist clique and, to a considerable degree, without a bureaucracy. Hence, Marx excluded England, where a revolution, even a people's revolution, was then conceived as, and indeed was, possible without the preliminary condition of destroying the "ready-made state machinery."

¶13 Today, in 1917, in the epoch of the first great imperialist war, this qualification made by Marx is no longer valid. Both England and America, the biggest and the last representatives--in the whole world--of Anglo-Saxon "liberty," in the sense that they had no militarist cliques and bureaucracy, have completely sunk into the all-European filthy, bloody morass of bureaucratic-military institutions which subordinate everything to themselves and trample everything underfoot. Today, in England and in America, too, "the preliminary condition for every real people's revolution" is the smashing, the destruction of the "readymade state machinery" (perfected in those countries, between 1914 and 1917, up to the "European," general imperialist standard).

¶14 Secondly, particular attention should be paid to Marx's extremely profound remark that the destruction of the bureaucratic-military state machine is "the preliminary condition for every real people's revolution." This idea of a "people's" revolution seems strange coming from Marx, so that the Russian Plekhanovites and Mensheviks, those followers of Struve who wish to be counted as Marxists, might possibly declare such an expression to be a "slip of the pen" on Marx's part. They have reduced Marxism to such a state of wretchedly liberal distortion that nothing exists for them beyond the antithesis between bourgeois revolution and proletarian revolution--and even this antithesis they interpret in an extremely lifeless way.

¶15 If we take the revolutions of the twentieth century as examples we shall, of course, have to admit that the Portuguese and Turkish revolutions are both bourgeois revolutions. Neither of them, however, is a "people's" revolution, inasmuch as in neither does the mass of the people, their enormous majority, come out actively, independently, with their own economic and political demands to any noticeable degree. On the contrary, although the Russian bourgeois revolution of 1905-07 displayed no such "brilliant" successes as at times fell to the lot of the Portuguese and Turkish revolutions, it was undoubtedly a "real people's" revolution, since the mass of the people, their majority, the very lowest social strata, crushed by oppression and exploitation, rose independently and placed on the entire course of the revolution the imprint of their own demands, of their attempts to build in their own way a new society in place of the old society that was being destroyed.

¶16 In Europe, in 1871, there was not a single country on the Continent in which the proletariat constituted the majority of the people. A "people's" revolution, one that actually drew the majority into the movement, could be such only if it embraced both the proletariat and the peasantry. These two classes then constituted the "people." These two classes are united by the fact that the "bureaucratic-military state machine" oppresses, crushes, exploits them. To break up this machine, to smash it--this is in the true interest of the "people," of their majority, of the workers and most of the peasants, this is "the preliminary condition" for a free alliance between the poor peasants and the proletarians, whereas without such an alliance democracy is unstable and socialist transformation is impossible.

¶17 As is well known, the Paris Commune was indeed working its way towards such an alliance, although it did not reach its goal owing to a number of circumstances, internal and external.

¶18 Consequently, in speaking of a "real people's revolution," Marx, without in the least forgetting the specific characteristics of the petty bourgeoisie (he spoke a great deal about them and often), took strict account of the actual balance of class forces in most of the continental countries of Europe in 1871. On the other hand, he stated that the "smashing" of the state machine was required by the interests of both the workers and the peasants, that it unites them, that it places before them the common task of removing the "parasite" and of replacing it by something new.

By what exactly?

¶12-13. Why did Marx confine his argument to the Continent? What was the case with England in 1871? What was possible then? What had changed by 1917? What became of Anglo-Saxon "liberty?" What was by then true of both England and America?

¶14-15. In what way do the opportunists distort Marx on people's revolution? How do they reduce Marx on this question? What does Lenin see in common with the Turkish and Portuguese revolutions, and the Russian revolution of 1905? What is the difference?

¶16-18. What was the class basis of people's revolution in 1871? Why? What is necessary on this basis? What things follow from this "preliminary condition?" How did the Paris Commune stand in these respects? Of what further class did Marx take account? For what purpose? What revolutionary task arises from the smashing of the state machinery?

2. BY WHAT IS THE SMASHED STATE MACHINE TO BE REPLACED?

¶1 In 1847, in The Communist Manifesto, Marx's answer to this question was as yet a purely abstract one, or, to be more exact, one indicating the tasks, but not the ways of accomplishing them. The answer given in The Communist Manifesto was that this machine was to be replaced by "the proletariat organized as the ruling class," by the "winning of the battle of democracy."

¶2 Not indulging in utopias, Marx expected the experience of the mass movement to provide the answer to the question as to what specific forms this organization of the proletariat as the ruling class will assume and as to the exact manner in which this organization will be combined with the most complete, most consistent "winning of the battle of democracy."

¶3 Marx subjected the experience of the Commune, meager as it was, to the most careful analysis in The Civil War in France. Let us quote the most important passages of this work.

Originating from the Middle Ages, there developed in the nineteenth century "the centralized state power, with its ubiquitous organs of standing army, police, bureaucracy, clergy, and judicature." With the development of the class antagonism between capital and labour, "the state power assumed more and more the character of the national power of capital over labour, of a public force organized for social enslavement, of an engine of class despotism. After every revolution marking a progressive phase in the class struggle, the purely repressive character of the state power stands out in bolder and bolder relief." After the revolution of 1848-49, the state power became "the national war-engine of capital against labour." The Second Empire consolidated this.

"The direct antithesis to the empire was the Commune." It was the "positive form" of "a republic that was not only to supersede the monarchical form of class rule, but class rule itself."

¶4 What was this "positive" form of the proletarian, socialist republic? What was the state it began to create?

"The first decree of the Commune . . . was the suppression of the standing army, and the substitution for it of the armed people."

¶5 This demand now figures in the programme of every party claiming the name of socialist. But the real worth of their programmes is best shown by the behavior of our Socialist Revolutionaries and Mensheviks, who, right after the revolution of February 27, actually refused to carry out this demand!

¶6 "The Commune was formed of the municipal councilors, chosen by universal suffrage in the various wards of the town, responsible and revocable at short terms. The majority of its members were naturally working men, or acknowledged representatives of the working class.... Instead of continuing to be the agent of the Central Government, the police was at once stripped of its political attributes, and turned into the responsible and at all times revocable agent of the Commune. So were the officials of all other branches of the Administration. From the members of the Commune downwards, the public service had to be done at workmen's wages. The vested interests and the representation allowances of the high dignitaries of state disappeared along with the high dignitaries themselves. . .

"Having once got rid of the standing army and the police, the physical force elements of the old government, the Commune was anxious to break the spiritual force of repression, the 'parson-power'....

"The judicial functionaries were to be divested of that sham independence . . . magistrates and judges were to be elective, responsible, and revocable."16

§2. By What Is the Smashed State Machine to Be Replaced?

¶1-2. How did Marx treat the workers state in 1848? Where did he <not> look for answers? For what questions did he seek answers, and on what basis?

¶3. What experience did Marx analyze in "The Civil War in France"? What was the form of the state power that developed in the 19th century? What was its content? What stood out more and more with each revolution? What was the antithesis of this state, and its aims?

¶4-5. What was the first decree of the Commune? How do the Socialist parties show the real worth of their programs?

¶6. How were the councilors of the Commune chosen, and from whom? What happened to the police and administration? What happened to the vested interests of the dignitaries? What happened to the ideological and judicial elements of the old state?

¶7 Thus the Commune appears to have replaced the smashed state machine "only" by fuller democracy: abolition of the standing army; all officials to be elected and subject to recall. But as a matter of fact this "only" signifies a gigantic replacement of certain institutions by other institutions of a fundamentally different order. This is exactly a case of "quantity becoming transformed into quality": democracy, introduced as fully and consistently as is at all conceivable, is transformed from bourgeois democracy into proletarian democracy; from the state (= a special force for the suppression of a particular class) into something which is no longer, properly speaking, the state.

¶8 It is still necessary to suppress the bourgeoisie and its resistance. This was particularly necessary for the Commune; and one of the reasons for its defeat was that it did not do this with sufficient determination. But the organ of suppression is here the majority of the population, and not a minority, as was always the case under slavery, serfdom and wage slavery. And since the majority of the people itself suppresses its oppressors, a "special force" for suppression is no longer necessary! In this sense the state begins to wither away. Instead of the special institutions of a privileged minority (privileged officialdom, the chiefs of the standing army), the majority itself can directly fulfil all these functions, and the more the functions of state power devolve upon the people as a whole the less need there is for the existence of this power.

¶9 In this connection the following measures of the Commune, emphasized by Marx, are particularly noteworthy: the abolition of all representation allowances, and of all monetary privileges for officials, the reduction of the pay of all servants of the state to the level of "workmen's wages." This shows more clearly than anything else the turn from bourgeois democracy to proletarian democracy, from the democracy of the oppressors to the democracy of the oppressed classes, from the state as a "special force" for the suppression of a particular class to the suppression of the oppressors by the general force of the majority of the people--the workers and the peasants. And it is precisely on this particularly striking point, perhaps the most important as far as the problem of the state is concerned, that the lessons taught by Marx have been most completely forgotten! In popular commentaries, the number of which is legion, this is not mentioned. It is "good form" to keep silent about it as if it were a piece of old-fashioned "naivete," just as the Christians, after their religion had been given the status of a state religion, "forgot" the "naivete" of primitive Christianity with its democratic revolutionary spirit.

¶10 The reduction of the pay of higher state officials seems to be "simply" a demand of naive, primitive democracy. One of the "founders" of modern opportunism, the ex-Social Democrat, Eduard Bernstein, has more than once indulged in repeating the vulgar bourgeois jeers at "primitive" democracy. Like all opportunists, and like the present Kautskyites, he utterly failed to understand that, first of all, the transition from capitalism to socialism is impossible without a certain "reversion" to "primitive" democracy (for how else can the majority, and then the whole population without exception, proceed to the discharge of state functions?); and that, secondly, "primitive democracy" based on capitalism and capitalist culture is not the same as primitive democracy in prehistoric or pre-capitalist times. Capitalist culture has created large-scale production, factories, railways, the postal service, telephones, etc., and on this basis most of the functions of the old "state power" have become so simplified and can be reduced to such exceedingly simple operations of registration, recording and checking that they can be easily performed by every literate person, can quite easily be performed for ordinary "workmen's wages," and that these functions can (and must) be stripped of every shadow of privilege, of "official grandeur."

¶11 All officials, without exception, elected and subject to recall at any time, their salaries reduced to the level of ordinary "workmen's wages"--these simple and "self-evident" democratic measures, while completely uniting the interests of the workers and the majority of the peasants, at the same time serve as a bridge leading from capitalism to socialism. These measures concern the reconstruction of the state, the purely political reconstruction of society; but, of course, they acquire their full meaning and significance only in connection with the "expropriation of the expropriators" either being accomplished or in preparation, i.e., with the transformation of capitalist private ownership of the means of production into social ownership.

¶12 "The Commune," Marx wrote, "made that catchword of bourgeois revolutions, cheap government, a reality by destroying the two greatest sources of expenditure--the standing army and state functionarism."

From the peasantry, as from other sections of the petty bourgeoisie, only an insignificant few "rise to the top," "get on in the world" in the bourgeois sense, i.e., become either well-to-do people, bourgeois, or officials in secure and privileged positions. In every capitalist country

¶7-8. What did the Commune seem to do? What was its real content? What example of "quantity into quality" took place? What task remained? Did the Commune fulfill this task? Who was to meet this task? Why is a "special force" no longer necessary? In what way does the state begin to wither away?

¶9-10. What particular measures of the Commune showed the turn from bourgeois democracy to proletarian democracy? How important is this point? How do the opportunists treat this question? What did the reduction of pay of officials seem to be? What two points do the opportunists not understand about "primitive democracy?" What remains of the functions of the old state? On what basis is "official grandeur" to be eliminated?

¶11-12. What end is served by "self-evident" democratic measures, and by what means? What type of social reconstruction do they serve? How is the full meaning of these measures acquired? How did the Commune make "cheap government" a reality? What do the peasants want in this respect? What is the only way this can be achieved? What else follows?

where there is a peasantry (as there is in most capitalist countries), the vast majority of the peasants are oppressed by the government and long for its overthrow, long for "cheap" government. This can be achieved only by the proletariat; and by achieving it, the proletariat at the same time takes a step towards the socialist reconstruction of the state.

3. ABOLITION OF PARLIAMENTARISM

¶1 "The Commune," Marx wrote, "was to be a working, not a parliamentary, body, executive and legislative at the same time."

"Instead of deciding once in three or six years which member of the ruling class was to represent and repress [ver- und zertreten] the people in Parliament, universal suffrage was to serve the people, constituted in Communes, as individual suffrage serves every other employer in the search for the workers, foremen and bookkeepers for his business." 17

¶2 Owing to the prevalence of social-chauvinism and opportunism, this remarkable criticism of parliamentarism made in 1871 also belongs now to the "forgotten words" of Marxism. The professional Cabinet Ministers and parliamentarians, the traitors to the proletariat and the "practical" socialists of our day, have left all criticism of parliamentarism to the anarchists, and, on this wonderfully reasonable ground, they denounce all criticism of parliamentarism as "anarchism"! It is not surprising that the proletariat of the "advanced" parliamentary countries, disgusted with such "socialists" as the Scheidemanns, Davids, Legiens, Sembats, Renaudels, Hendersons, Vanderveldes, Staunings, Brantings, Bissolatis and Co., has been with increasing frequency giving its sympathies to anarcho-syndicalism, despite the fact that the latter is but the blood brother of opportunism.

¶3 For Marx, however, revolutionary dialectics was never the empty fashionable phrase, the toy rattle, which Plekhanov, Kautsky and the others have made of it. Marx knew how to break with anarchism ruthlessly for its inability to make use even of the "pigsty" of bourgeois parliamentarism, especially when the situation is obviously not revolutionary; but at the same time he knew how to subject parliamentarism to genuine revolutionary-proletarian criticism.

¶4 To decide once every few years which member of the ruling class is to repress and crush the people in parliament--such is the real essence of bourgeois parliamentarism, not only in parliamentary-constitutional monarchies, but also in the most democratic republics.

¶5 But if we pose the question of the state, and if we consider parliamentarism as one of the institutions of the state, from the point of view of the tasks of the proletariat in this field, what is the way out of parliamentarism? How can it be dispensed with?

¶6 Again and again we have to repeat: The lessons taught by Marx, based on the study of the Commune, have been so completely forgotten that the present-day "Social-Democrat" (read present-day traitor to socialism) really cannot understand any criticism of parliamentarism, other than anarchist or reactionary criticism.

¶7 The way out of parliamentarism is not, of course, the abolition of representative institutions and the electoral principle, but the conversion of the representative institutions from talking shops into "working" bodies. "The Commune was to be a working, not a parliamentary, body, executive and legislative at the same time."

¶8 "A working, not a parliamentary, body"--this hits straight from the shoulder at the present-day parliamentarians and parliamentary "lap-dogs" of Social-Democracy I Take any parliamentary country, from America to Switzerland, from France to England, Norway and so forth--in these countries the real business of "state" is performed behind the scenes and is carried on by the departments, chancelleries and general staffs. In parliament this is just chatter for the special purpose of fooling the "common people." This is so true that even in the Russian republic, a bourgeois democratic republic, all these sins of parliamentarism were immediately revealed, even before it managed to set up a real parliament. Such heroes of rotten philistinism as the Skobelevs and Tseretelis, the Chernovs and Avksentyevs, have even succeeded in polluting the Soviets after the fashion of most disgusting bourgeois parliamentarism, in converting them into hollow talking shops. In the Soviets, Messrs. the "socialist" ministers are duping the credulous rustics with phrase-mongering and resolutions. In the government itself a sort of permanent quadrille is going on in order that, on the one hand, as many Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks as possible may in turn get near the "pie," the lucrative and honorable posts, and that, on the other hand, the "attention" of the people may be "engaged." Meanwhile, it is in the chancelleries and general staffs that they "do" the business of "state"!

¶9 Dyelo Naroda, the organ of the ruling "Socialist-Revolutionary" Party, recently admitted in an editorial article--with the matchless candor of people of "good society," in which "all" are engaged in political prostitution--that even in the ministries headed by the "socialists" (pardon the expression!), the whole bureaucratic apparatus has in fact remained as of old, is working in the old way and quite "freely" sabotaging revolutionary measures! Even without this admission, does not the actual history of the participation of the Socialist-Revolutionaries and Mensheviks

§3. Abolition of Parliamentarism

¶1-2. How was the Commune to differ from bourgeois parliamentarism (i.e., electoral politics)?

How was suffrage to serve the people? How do the opportunists treat Marx' criticism of Parliamentarism? How do the "professional cabinet ministers," et. al., treat this question? How do the workers respond?

¶3-4. What do the opportunists make of revolutionary dialectics? What was Marx' approach to parliamentarism? What special point did he make? What is the real essence of bourgeois parliamentarism, and under what circumstances?

¶5-7. What question confronts the proletariat on parliamentarism and the state? How do the opportunists understand this question? What is the way out, and what is not?

¶8-9. How does the phrase, "a working, not a parliamentary body," strike at bourgeois parliamentarism? How does this apply to the opportunists? What did they do in Russia? What actually happened? What did the S-R's admit? What is the opportunists' only noteworthy fact? What is the essence of the opportunists' "honest" coalition?

in the government prove this? Noteworthy about it is only the fact that, in the ministerial company of the Cadets, Messrs. the Chernovs, Rusanovs, Zenzinovs and the other editors of Dyelo Naroda have so completely lost all sense of shame as to unblushingly proclaim, as if it were a mere bagatelle, that in "their" ministries everything has remained as of old!! Revolutionary-democratic phrases to gull the rural Simple Simons; bureaucracy and red tape to "gladden the hearts" of the capitalists--that is the essence of the "honest" coalition.

¶10 The Commune substitutes for the venal and rotten parliamentarism of bourgeois society institutions in which freedom of opinion and of discussion does not degenerate into deception, for the parliamentarians themselves have to work, have to execute their own laws, have themselves to test their results in real life, and to render account directly to their constituents. Representative institutions remain, but there is no parliamentarism here as a special system, as the division of labour between the legislative and the executive, as a privileged position for the deputies. We cannot imagine democracy, even proletarian democracy, without representative institutions, but we can and must imagine democracy without parliamentarism, if criticism of bourgeois society is not mere empty words for us, if the desire to overthrow the rule of the bourgeoisie is our earnest and sincere desire, and not a mere "election" cry for catching workers' votes, as with the Mensheviks and Socialist-Revolutionaries, as with the Scheidemanns and Legiens, as with the Sembats and Vanderveldes.

¶11 It is extremely instructive to note that, in speaking of the functions of those officials who are necessary for the Commune and for proletarian democracy, Marx compares them to the staff of "every other employer," that is, to the ordinary capitalist enterprise, with its "workers, foremen and bookkeepers."

¶12 There is no trace of utopianism in Marx, in the sense that he made up or invented a "new" society. No, he studied the birth of the new society out of the old, the forms of transition from the latter to the former, as a natural-historical process. He examined the actual experience of a mass proletarian movement and tried to draw practical lessons from it. He "learned" from the Commune, just as all the great revolutionary thinkers were not afraid to learn from the experience of the great movements of the oppressed classes, and never addressed them with pedantic "homilies" (such as Plekhanov's: "They should not have taken up arms"; or Tsereteli's: "A class must limit itself").

¶13 There can be no thought of abolishing the bureaucracy at once, everywhere and completely. That is utopia. But to smash the old bureaucratic machine at once and to begin immediately to construct a new one that will make possible the gradual abolition of all bureaucracy--this is not utopia, this is the experience of the Commune, this is the direct and immediate task of the revolutionary proletariat.

¶14 Capitalism simplifies the functions of "state" administration; it makes it possible to "boss" by superiors aside and to confine the whole matter to the organization of the proletarians (as the ruling class), which will hire "workers, foremen and bookkeepers" in the name of the whole of society.

¶15 We are not utopians, we do not indulge in "dreams" of dispensing at once with all administration, with all subordination. These anarchist dreams, based upon a lack of understanding of the tasks of the proletarian dictatorship, are totally alien to Marxism, and, in fact, serve only to postpone the socialist revolution until people are different. No, we want the socialist revolution with people as they are now, with people who cannot dispense with subordination, control and "foremen and bookkeepers."

¶16 But the subordination must be to the armed vanguard of all the exploited and working people, i.e., to the proletariat. A beginning can and must be made at once, overnight, of replacing the specific "bossing" of state officials by the simple functions of "foremen and bookkeepers," functions which are already fully within the capacity of the average city dweller and can well be performed for "workmen's wages."

¶17 We ourselves, the workers, will organize large-scale production on the basis of what capitalism has already created, relying on our own experience as workers, establishing the strictest, iron discipline supported by the state power of the armed workers; we will reduce the role of the state officials to that of simply carrying out our instructions as responsible, revocable, modestly paid "foremen and bookkeepers" (of course, along with technicians of all sorts, types and degrees). This is our proletarian task, this is what we can and must start with when the proletarian revolution is accomplished. Such a beginning, on the basis of large-scale production,

¶10. How does the Commune overcome the deception of bourgeois parliamentarism? In what way is it eliminated? What is necessary for democracy if the bourgeoisie is to be overthrown? How does this contrast with the opportunists?

¶11-14. To what does Marx compare the functions of officials of the Commune? How did he develop this conclusion? How do the opportunists compare? What utopian idea does Lenin reject? What must be done instead? How does Lenin support his conclusions? What is the historical background for these developments?

¶15-17. Of what do the anarchists dream, and on what basis? What is the only purpose served by the anarchist dreams? For what instead does Marxism stand? To whom must the revolution be subordinated? How must the "bossing" of state officials be eliminated? By what elements will the workers organize production? To what will the role of the state officials be reduced? What process will begin, and on what basis? What will happen to the functions of control and accounting?

will of itself lead to the gradual "withering away" of all bureaucracy, to the gradual creation of an order--an order without quotation marks, an order bearing no resemblance to wage slavery--an order under which the functions of control and accounting, becoming more and more simple, will be performed by each in turn, will then become a habit and will finally die out as the special functions of a special section of the population.

¶18 A witty German Social-Democrat of the seventies of the last century called the postal service a pattern of the socialist economy. This is very true. At present the postal service is a business organized on the lines of a state-capitalist monopoly. Imperialism is gradually transforming all trusts into organizations of a similar type, in which, standing over the "common" toilers, who are overworked and starved, is the same bourgeois bureaucracy. But the mechanism of social management is here already to hand. We have but to overthrow the capitalists, to crush the resistance of these exploiters with the iron hand of the armed workers, to smash the bureaucratic machine of the modern state--and we shall have a splendidly equipped mechanism, freed from the "parasite," a mechanism which can very well be set going by the united workers themselves, who will hire technicians, foremen and bookkeepers, and pay them all, as, indeed, all "state" officials in general, workmen's wages. Here is a concrete, practical task, immediately possible of fulfillment in relation to all trusts, a task that will rid the working people of exploitation and take account of what the Commune had already begun to practice (particularly in building up the state).

¶19 To organize the whole national economy on the lines of the postal service, so that the technicians, foremen, book keepers, as well as all officials, shall receive salaries no higher than "workmen's wages," all under the control and leadership of the armed proletariat--this is our immediate aim. It is such a state, standing on such an economic foundation, that we need. This is what will bring about the abolition of parliamentarism and the preservation of representative institutions. This is what will rid the laboring classes of the prostitution of these institutions by the bourgeoisie.

4. ORGANIZATION OF THE UNITY OF THE NATION

¶1 "In a rough sketch of national organization which the Commune had no time to develop, it states clearly that the Commune was to be the political form of even the smallest country hamlet...." The Communes were to elect the "National Delegation" in Paris.

"The few but important functions which still would remain for a central government were not to be suppressed, as has been intentionally misstated, but were to be discharged by Communal, and therefore strictly responsible agents.

"The unity of the nation was not to be broken, but, on the contrary, to be organized by the Communal Constitution, and to become a reality by the destruction of the state power which claimed to be the embodiment of that unity independent of, and superior to, the nation itself, from which it was but a parasitic excrescence. While the merely repressive organs of the old governmental power were to be amputated, its legitimate functions were to be wrested from an authority usurping pre-eminence over society itself, and restored to the responsible agents of society. "

¶2 To what extent the opportunists of present-day Social Democracy have failed to understand--or perhaps it would be more true to say, have refused to understand--these observations of Marx's is best shown by that book of Herostratean fame of the renegade Bernstein, The Premises of Socialism and the Tasks of Social-Democracy. It is precisely in connection with the above passage from Marx that Bernstein wrote that this programme, "in its political content, displays in all its essential features the greatest similarity to the federalism of Proudhon.... In spite of all the other points of difference between Marx and the 'petty-bourgeois' Proudhon [Bernstein places the words "petty-bourgeois" in quotation marks in order to make it sound ironical] on these points their lines of reasoning run as close as could be." Of course, Bernstein continues, the importance of the municipalities is growing, but "it seems doubtful to me whether the first task of democracy would be such a dissolution [Auflosung] of the modern states and the complete transformation [Umwandlung] of their organization as is visualized by Marx and Proudhon (the formation of a National Assembly from delegates of the provincial or district assemblies, which, in their turn, would consist of delegates from the Communes), so that the whole previous mode of national representation would vanish completely." (Bernstein, Premises, German edition, 1899, pp. 134 and 136.)

¶3 To confuse Marx's views on the "destruction of the state power--the parasite" with Proudhon's federalism is positively monstrous! But it is no accident, for it never occurs to the opportunist that Marx does not speak here at all about federalism as opposed to centralism, but about smashing the old, bourgeois state machine which exists in all bourgeois countries.

¶4 The only thing that penetrates the opportunist's mind is what he sees around him, in an environment of petty bourgeois philistinism and "reformist" stagnation, namely, only "municipalities"! The opportunist has even forgotten how to think about proletarian revolution.

¶18-19. Why does Lenin call the postal service a pattern of socialist economy? What transformation is worked by imperialism? What is the social content? How is the proletariat to win its economic mechanism of control? What is the key to this mechanism? What will it accomplish? What is the immediate aim? What will fulfillment of this task bring about?

¶1. How far did the Commune proceed on the question of national organization? How were the central government functions to be discharged? How was the unity of the nation to be organized? How was it to become a reality? What were the aims of the Commune?

¶2-4. How did Bernstein take Marx on this question? How did Bernstein compare Marx to the anarchist Proudhon on this question? With what does Bernstein charge Marx? How does Lenin compare Proudhon and Marx? What never occurs to the opportunist? What is the only thing that penetrates the opportunists' mind? Why? What does he forget?

¶5 It is ridiculous. But the remarkable thing is that nobody argued with Bernstein on this point. Bernstein has been refuted by many, especially by Plekhanov in Russian literature and by Kautsky in European literature, but neither of them said anything about this distortion of Marx by Bernstein.

¶6 To such an extent has the opportunist forgotten how to think in a revolutionary way and to ponder over revolution that he attributes "federalism" to Marx and confuses him with the founder of anarchism, Proudhon. And Kautsky and Plekhanov, who claim to be orthodox Marxists and defenders of the doctrine of revolutionary Marxism, are silent on this point! Herein lies one of the roots of the extreme vulgarization of the views concerning the difference between Marxism and anarchism, which is characteristic of the Kautskyites and of the opportunists, and which we shall yet discuss.

¶7 There is not a trace of federalism in Marx's above-quoted observations on the experience of the Commune. Marx agreed with Proudhon on the very point that the opportunist Bernstein failed to see. Marx disagreed with Proudhon on the very point on which Bernstein found a resemblance between them.

¶8 Marx agreed with Proudhon in that they both stood for the "smashing" of the present-day state machine. Neither the opportunists nor the Kautskyites wish to see this resemblance between Marxism and anarchism (both Proudhon and Bakunin) because they have departed from Marxism on this point.

¶9 Marx disagreed both with Proudhon and with Bakunin precisely on the question of federalism (not to mention the dictatorship of the proletariat). Federalism as a principle follows logically from the petty-bourgeois views of anarchism. Marx was a centralist. There is no departure whatever from centralism in his observations just quoted. Only those who are imbued with the philistine "superstitious belief" in the state can mistake the destruction of the bourgeois state machine for the destruction of centralism!

¶10 Well, and what if the proletariat and the poor peasantry take state power into their own hands, organize themselves quite freely in Communes, and unite the action of all the Communes in striking at capital, in crushing the resistance of the capitalists, and in transferring the privately-owned railways, factories, land and so forth to the entire nation, to the whole of society--will that not be centralism? Will that not be the most consistent democratic centralism? And proletarian centralism at that?

¶11 Bernstein simply cannot conceive of the possibility of voluntary centralism, of the voluntary amalgamation of the Communes into the nation, of the voluntary fusion of the proletarian Communes, in the work of destroying bourgeois rule and the bourgeois state machine. Like all philistines, Bernstein pictures centralism only as something from above, to be imposed and maintained solely by the bureaucracy and the military clique.

¶12 As though foreseeing the possibility of his views being distorted, Marx purposely emphasized that the charge that the Commune wanted to destroy the unity of the nation, to abolish the central authority was a deliberate fake. Marx purposely used the words: "The unity of the nation was . . . to be organized," so as to oppose conscious, democratic, proletarian centralism to bourgeois, military, bureaucratic centralism.

¶13 But, there are none so deaf as those who will not hear. And the very thing the opportunists of present-day Social Democracy do not want to hear about is the destruction of the state power, the amputation of the parasitic excrescence.

5. DESTRUCTION OF THE PARASITE--THE STATE

¶1 We have already quoted Marx's utterances on this subject, and we must now supplement them.

"It is generally the fate of completely new historical creations," he wrote, "to be mistaken for the counterpart of older and even defunct forms of social life, to which they may bear a certain likeness. Thus, this new Commune, which breaks the modern state power, has been mistaken for a reproduction of the medieval Communes . . . for . . . a federation of small states, as dreamt of by Montesquieu and the Girondins, . . . for an exaggerated form of the ancient struggle against over-centralization...."

"The Communal Constitution would have restored to the social body all the forces hitherto absorbed by the state parasite feeding upon, and clogging the free movement of, society. By this one act it would have initiated the regeneration of France...."

". . . the Communal Constitution brought the rural producers under the intellectual lead of the central towns of their districts, and there secured to them, in the working men, the natural trustees of their interests. The very existence of the Commune involved, as a matter of course, local municipal liberty, but no longer as a check upon the now superseded state power."

¶5-6. What is the remarkable thing? To what extent has Bernstein forgotten to think in a revolutionary way? How do the self-described "orthodox" respond? What root does Lenin see?

¶7-9. Of what was there no trace in Marx's observations of the Commune? How did Bernstein get the relation between Marx and Proudhon? What resemblance do the opportunists not want to see? On what point did Marx disagree with the anarchists? What is the class basis of federalism? What was Marx' principle? What is the basis of the opportunists' confusion?

¶10-13. What measures follow from the taking of state power by the proletariat and the poor peasants? What do these things amount to? What possibility can Bernstein not conceive, and why not? What did Marx purposely emphasize? Why? Of what thing do the opportunists not want to hear?

¶5. Destruction of the Parasite--the State

¶1. What is the general fate of completely new historical creations? How was this the case for the Commune? How would the Commune have regenerated France? How would it have secured the interests of the rural producers? How would local municipal liberty be different?

¶2 "Breaking of the state power," which was a "parasitic excrescence"; its "amputation," its "smashing"; "the now superseded state power"--these are the expressions Marx used in regard to the state when appraising and analyzing the experience of the Commune.

¶3 All this was written a little less than half a century ago; and now one has to engage in excavations, as it were, in order to bring undistorted Marxism to the knowledge of the broad masses. The conclusions drawn from the observation of the last great revolution which Marx lived through were forgotten just at the moment when the time for the next great proletarian revolutions had arrived.

¶4 "The multiplicity of interpretations to which the Commune has been subjected, and the multiplicity of interests which construed it in their favor, show that it was a thoroughly expansive political form, while all previous forms of government had been emphatically repressive. Its true secret was this. It was essentially a working-class government, the produce of the struggle of the producing against the appropriating class, the political form at last discovered under which to work out the economic emancipation of labour.

"Except on this last condition, the Communal Constitution would have been an impossibility and a delusion."

¶5 The utopians busied themselves with "discovering" political forms under which the socialist transformation of society was to take place. The anarchists dismissed the question of political forms altogether. The opportunists of present-day Social-Democracy have accepted the bourgeois political forms of the parliamentary democratic state as the limit which should not be overstepped; they battered their foreheads praying before this "model" and denounced as anarchism all desire to break up these forms.

¶6 Marx deduced from the whole history of socialism and of the political struggle that the state was bound to disappear, and that the transitional form of its disappearance (the transition from state to non-state) would be the "proletariat organized as the ruling class." But Marx did not set out to discover the political forms of this future stage. He limited himself to exact observation of French history, to an analysis of it, and to the conclusion to which the year 1851 had led, namely, that matters were moving towards the demolition of the bourgeois state machine.

¶7 And when the mass revolutionary movement of the proletariat burst forth, Marx, in spite of the failure of that movement, in spite of its short life and its patent weakness, began to study what forms it had discovered.

¶8 The Commune is the form "at last discovered" by the proletarian revolution, under which the economic emancipation of labour can take place.

¶9 The Commune is the first attempt of a proletarian revolution to smash the bourgeois state machine; and it is the political form "at last discovered," by which the smashed state machine can and must be replaced.

¶10 We shall see further on that the Russian revolutions of 1905 and 1917, in different circumstances and under different conditions, continue the work of the Commune and confirm the brilliant historical analysis given by Marx.

¶2-3. What undistorted conclusions of Marxism now need to be excavated? At what moment are these conclusions forgotten?

¶4-6. How was it shown that the Commune differed from previous forms of government, and how did it differ? What was the essence of the Commune, and its purpose? What would the Communal Constitution have been otherwise? What posture did the utopians take toward the question of political forms? The anarchists? The opportunists? What did Marx deduce, and by what means?

¶7-10. Under what circumstances did Marx study the experience of the mass revolutionary movement of the proletariat? What discovered the political forms of the proletarian revolution? Of what is the Commune the first attempt? How was its work continued?

CHAPTER IV

CONTINUATION. SUPPLEMENTARY EXPLANATIONS BY ENGELS

¶1 Marx gave the fundamentals on the subject of the significance of the experience of the Commune. Engels returned to the same subject repeatedly and explained Marx's analysis and conclusions, sometimes elucidating other aspects of the question with such power and vividness that it is necessary to dwell specifically on his explanations.

1. THE HOUSING QUESTION

¶1 In his work, The Housing Question (1872), Engels already took into account the experience of the Commune, and dwelt several times on the tasks of the revolution in relation to the state. It is interesting to note that the treatment of this concrete subject clearly revealed, on the one hand, points of similarity between the proletarian state and the present day state--points that warrant speaking of the state in both cases--and, on the other hand, points of difference between them, or the transition to the destruction of the state.

¶2 "How is the housing question to be settled, then? In present-day society, just as any other social question is settled: by the gradual economic levelling of demand and supply, a settlement which reproduces the question itself again and again and therefore is no settlement. How a social revolution would settle this question not only depends on the circumstances in each particular case, but is also connected with much more far-reaching questions, one of the most fundamental of which is the abolition of the antithesis between town and country. As it is not our task to create utopian systems for the organization of the future society, it would be more than idle to go into the question here. But one thing is certain: there is-already a sufficient quantity of houses in the big cities to remedy immediately any real 'housing shortage,' provided they are used judiciously. This can naturally only occur through the expropriation of the present owners by quartering in their house homeless workers or workers overcrowded in their present homes. As soon as the proletariat has won political power, such a measure dictated in the public interest will be just as easy to carry out as are other expropriations and bilietings by the present-day state." (German edition, 1887, p. 22.)¹⁸

¶3 The change in the form of the state power is not examined here, but only the content of its activity. Expropriations and bilietings take place by order even of the present-day state. From the formal point of view, the proletarian state will also "order" the occupation of apartments and expropriation of buildings. But it is clear that the old executive apparatus, the bureaucracy, which is connected with the bourgeoisie, would simply be unfit to carry out the orders of the proletarian state.

¶4 ". . . it must be pointed out that the 'actual seizure' of all the instruments of labour, the taking possession of industry as a whole by the working people, is the exact opposite of the Proudhonist 'redemption.' In the latter case the individual worker becomes the owner of the dwelling, the peasant farm, the instruments of labour; in the former case, the 'working people' remain the collective owners of the houses, factories and instruments of labour, and will hardly permit their use, at least during a transitional period, by individuals or associations without compensation for the cost. In the same way, the abolition of property in land is not the abolition of ground rent but its transfer, although in a modified form, to society. The actual seizure of all the instruments of labour by the working people, therefore, does not at all preclude the retention of rent relation." (P. 68.)

¶5 We shall discuss the question touched upon in this passage, namely, the economic basis for the withering away of the state, in the next chapter. Engels expresses himself most cautiously, saying that the proletarian state would "hardly" allot housing free of payment, "at least during a transitional period." The letting of dwellings owned by the whole people to individual families presupposes the collection of rent, a certain amount of control, and the employment of some standard in the allotment of housing. All this calls for a certain form of state, but it does not at all call for a special military and bureaucratic apparatus, with officials occupying an especially privileged position. The transition to a state of affairs when it will be possible to supply dwellings rent free is connected with the complete "withering away" of the state.

CH IV. Continuation.
Supplementary Explanation by Engels

Intro - Why does Lenin dwell specifically on Engels' explanations?

§1. The Housing Question

¶1-3. What was taken into account in "THQ"? What did it reveal? How is the housing question settled under capitalism? How should the question not be approached? How is it solved under socialism? On what basis? What aspect of the state power is examined here? What does it show about the existing bureaucracy?

¶4-5. What is the difference between the seizure of instruments of labor, and their "redemption?" Why does the seizure of the instruments of labor not preclude rent relations? What does the letting of buildings owned by the people imply? How does the withering away of the state follow?

¶6 Speaking of the conversion of the Blanquists to the principled Marxist position after the Commune and under the influence of its experience, Engels, in passing, formulates this position as follows:

"... necessity of political action by the proletariat and of its dictatorship as the transition to the abolition of classes and, with them, of the state...." (P. 55)

¶7 Addicts to hair-splitting criticism, or bourgeois "exterminators of Marxism," will perhaps see a contradiction between this recognition of the "abolition of the state" and the repudiation of this formula as an anarchist one in the above-quoted passage from Anti-Duhring. It would not be surprising if the opportunists included Engels, too, among the "anarchists"; for now the practice of accusing the internationalists of anarchism is becoming more and more widespread among the social-chauvinists.

¶8 Marxism has always taught that with the abolition of classes the state will also be abolished. The well-known passage on the "withering away of the state" in Anti-Duhring accuses the anarchists not simply of standing for the abolition of the state, but of preaching that the state can be abolished "overnight."

¶9 In view of the fact that the now dominant "Social Democratic" doctrine completely distorts the relation of Marxism to anarchism on the question of the destruction of the state, it will be particularly useful to recall a controversy of Marx and Engels against the anarchists.

2. CONTROVERSY WITH THE ANARCHISTS

¶1 This controversy took place in 1873. Marx and Engels contributed articles against the Proudhonists, "autonomists" or "anti-authoritarians," to an Italian socialist annual, and it was not until 1913 that these articles appeared in German translation in the Neue Zeit.¹⁹

"If the political struggle of the working class assumes revolutionary forms," wrote Marx, ridiculing the anarchists for their repudiation of politics, "and if the workers set up their revolutionary dictatorship in place of the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, they commit the terrible crime of violating principles; for in order to satisfy their wretched, vulgar everyday needs and to crush the resistance of the bourgeoisie, they give the state a revolutionary and transient form, instead of laying down their arms and abolishing the state." (Neue Zeit, Vol. XXXII, 1, 1913-14, P. 40.)

¶2 It was solely against this kind of "abolition" of the state that Marx rose up to fight in refuting the anarchists! Not at all against the view that the state would disappear when classes disappeared, or that it would be abolished when classes were abolished; what he opposed was renunciation by the workers of the use of arms, of organized violence, that is, of the state, which is to serve to "crush the resistance of the bourgeoisie."

¶3 To prevent the true meaning of his struggle against anarchism from being distorted, Marx purposely emphasized the "revolutionary and transient form" of the state which the proletariat needs. The proletariat needs the state only temporarily. We do not at all disagree with the anarchists on the question of the abolition of the state as the aim. We maintain that, to achieve this aim, we must temporarily make use of the instruments, resources and methods of the state power against the exploiters, just as the temporary dictatorship of the oppressed class is necessary for the abolition of classes. Marx chooses the sharpest and clearest way of stating his case against the anarchists: After overthrowing the yoke of the capitalists, should the workers "lay down their arms," or use them against the capitalists in order to crush their resistance? But what is the systematic use of arms by one class against another, if not a "transient form" of the state?

¶4 Let every Social-Democrat ask himself: Is that the way he has been putting the question of the state in controversy with the anarchists? Is that the way it has been put by the vast majority of the official socialist parties of the Second International?

¶5 Engels expounds the same ideas in much greater detail and still more popularly. First of all he ridicules the muddled ideas of the Proudhonists, who called themselves "anti-authoritarians," i.e., repudiated all authority, all subordination, all power. Take a factory, a railway, a ship on the high seas, said Engels: is it not clear that not one of these complex technical establishments, based on the application of machinery and the planned co-operation of many people, could function without a certain amount of subordination and, consequently, without a certain amount of authority or power?

"If I counter the most rabid anti-authoritarians with these arguments, the only answer they can give me is the following: Oh, that's true, but here it is not a question of authority with which we vest our delegates, but of a commission! These people imagine they can change a thing by changing its name."

¶6-9. Why would the opportunists accuse Engels of anarchism? What has Marxism always taught on the abolition of the state? How does Marxism criticize anarchism in this respect? How do the anarchists treat the relation between Marxism and anarchism?

§2. Controversy with the Anarchists

¶1-2. Of what terrible crime do the anarchists accuse the workers concerning the state? Why do the workers commit this "crime?" On what point did Marx not dispute the anarchists? On what point did he dispute them?

¶3-4. Why did Marx emphasize the "revolutionary and transient form" of the proletarian state? What is the aim of the proletarian state? How is it achieved? How does Marx state his case? What questions must revolutionaries ask themselves?

¶5. What did the Proudhonists imagine themselves to be? How did Engels ridicule them? How did they reply?

¶6 Having thus shown that authority and autonomy are relative terms, that the sphere of their application changes with the various phases of social development, that it is absurd to take them as absolutes, and adding that the sphere of the application of machinery and large-scale production is constantly expanding, Engels passes from the general discussion of authority to the question of the state.

¶7 "Had the autonomists," he wrote, "contented themselves with saying that the social organization of the future would allow authority only within the bounds which the conditions of production make inevitable, one could have come to terms with them. But they are blind to all facts that make authority necessary and they passionately fight the word.

"Why do the anti-authoritarians not confine themselves to crying out against political authority, the state? All socialists are agreed that the state, and with it political authority, will disappear as a result of the coming social revolution, that is, that public functions will lose their political character and become mere administrative functions of watching over social interests. But the anti-authoritarians demand that the political state be abolished at one stroke, even before the social relations that gave birth to it have been destroyed. They demand that the first act of the social revolution shall be the abolition of authority.

"Have these gentlemen ever seen a revolution? A revolution is certainly the most authoritarian thing there is; it is an act whereby one part of the population imposes its will upon the other part by means of rifles, bayonets and cannon, all of which are highly authoritarian means. And the victorious party must maintain its rule by means of the terror which its arms inspire in the reactionaries. Would the Paris Commune have lasted more than a day if it had not used the authority of the armed people against the bourgeoisie? Cannot we, on the contrary, blame it for having made too little use of that authority? Therefore, one of two things: either the anti-authoritarians don't know what they are talking about, in which case they are creating nothing but confusion; or they do know, and in that case they are betraying the cause of the proletariat. In either case they serve only reaction." (P. 39.)

¶8 This argument touches upon questions which should be examined in connection with the subject of the relation between politics and economics during the withering away of the state (the next chapter is devoted to this subject). Such questions are: the transformation of public functions from political into simple functions of administration, and the "political state." This last term, one particularly liable to cause misunderstanding, indicates the process of the withering away of the state: at a certain stage of this process the state which is withering away can be called a non-political state.

¶9 Again, the most remarkable thing in this argument of Engels is the way he states the case against the anarchists. The Social-Democrats, claiming to be disciples of Engels, have argued on this subject against the anarchists millions of times since 1873, but they have not argued as Marxists can and should. The anarchist idea of the abolition of the state is muddled and non-revolutionary--that is how Engels put it. It is precisely the revolution in its rise and development, with its specific tasks in relation to violence, authority, power, the state, that the anarchists do not wish to see.

¶10 The usual criticism of anarchism by present-day Social Democrats has boiled down to the purest philistine banality: "We recognize the state, whereas the anarchists do not!" Naturally, such banality cannot but repel workers who are in the least thoughtful and revolutionary. What Engels says is different. He emphasizes the fact that all socialists recognize that the state will disappear as a result of the socialist revolution. He then deals concretely with the question of the revolution--the very question which, as a rule, the Social-Democrats, because of their opportunism, evade, and leave, so to speak, exclusively for the anarchists "to work out." And, when dealing with this question, Engels takes the bull by the horns; he asks: Should not the Commune have made more use of the revolutionary power of the state, that is, of the proletariat armed and organized as the ruling class?

¶11 Dominant official Social-Democracy usually dismissed the question of the concrete tasks of the proletariat in the revolution either with a philistine sneer, or, at best, with the sophistic evasion: "Wait and see." And the anarchists were thus justified in saying about such Social-Democracy that it was betraying its task of giving the workers a revolutionary education. Engels draws upon the experience of the last proletarian revolution precisely for the purpose of making a most concrete study of what should be done by the proletariat, and in what manner, in relation to both the banks and the state.

¶6-7. What kinds of terms are authority and autonomy?

Under what conditions might it have been possible to come to terms with the anarchists? What happened? What anti-authoritarian demand did Engels criticize and how? How does Engels criticize the anti-authoritarians' view of revolution? For what did Engels blame the Commune? Of what two things must one be true of the anti-authoritarians?

¶8-9. On what questions does Engels' argument touch? What process is indicated by the term "political state?" What is the most remarkable thing in Engels' argument? Have the opportunists argued against the anarchists as they should? How did Engels put the case against the anarchists? What is it about revolution that the anarchists do not wish to see?

¶10-11. What does the opportunist criticism of anarchism boil down to? What is its effect? What does Engels do instead? What question do the opportunists evade? How does Engels take the bull by the horns? How do the opportunists treat the concrete tasks of the proletariat in the revolution? What were the anarchists justified in saying? For what purpose does Engels draw on the experience of the Commune?

3. LETTER TO BEBEL

¶1 One of the most remarkable, if not the most remarkable, of the observations on the state in the works of Marx and Engels is contained in the following passage in Engels' letter to Bebel dated March 18-28, 1875. This letter, we may observe parenthetically, was, as far as we know, first published by Bebel in the second volume of his memoirs (Aus meinem Leben), which appeared in 1911, i.e., thirty-six years after the letter had been written and mailed.

¶2 Engels wrote to Bebel criticizing that same draft of the Gotha Programme which Marx criticized in his famous letter to Bracke. Referring particularly to the question of the state, Engels said:

"The free people's state is transformed into the free state. Taken in its grammatical sense, a free state is one where the state is free in relation to its citizens, hence a state with a despotic government. The whole talk about the state should be dropped, especially since the Commune, which was no longer a state in the proper sense of the word. The 'people's state' has been thrown in our faces by the anarchists to the point of disgust, although already Marx's book against Proudhon and later The Communist Manifesto directly declare that with the introduction of the socialist order of society the state will dissolve [sich auflöst] of itself and disappear. As, therefore, the state is only a transitional institution which is used in the struggle, in the revolution, in order to hold down one's adversaries by force, it is pure nonsense to talk of a free people's state: so long as the proletariat still uses the state, it does not use it in the interests of freedom but in order to hold down its adversaries, and as soon as it becomes possible to speak of freedom the state as such ceases to exist. We would therefore propose to replace state everywhere by 'Gemeinwesen' [community], a good old German word which can very well represent the French word 'commune.'" (Pp. 32}-22 of the German original.)²⁰

¶3 It should be borne in mind that this letter refers to the Party programme which Marx criticized in a letter dated only a few weeks later than the above (Marx's letter is dated May 5, 1875), and that at the time Engels was living with Marx in London. Consequently, when he says "we" in the last sentence, Engels undoubtedly, in his own as well as in Marx's name, suggests to the leader of the German workers' party that the word "state" be thrown out of the programme and replaced by the word "community."

¶4 What a howl about "anarchism" would be raised by the leading lights of present-day "Marxism," which has been falsified for the convenience of the opportunists, if such a correction of the programme were suggested to them!

¶5 Let them howl. The bourgeoisie will praise them for it. But we shall go on with our work. In revising the programme of our Party we must unflinchingly take the advice of Engels and Marx into consideration in order to be closer to the truth, to restore Marxism by purging it of distortions, to guide the struggle of the working class for its emancipation more correctly. Certainly no one opposed to the advice of Engels and Marx will be found among the Bolsheviks. The only difficulty that may, perhaps, arise will be in regard to terminology. In German there are two words meaning "community," of which Engels used the one which does not denote a single community, but their totality, a system of communities. In Russian there is no such word, and perhaps we may have to choose the French word "commune," although this also has its drawbacks.

¶6 "The Commune was no longer a state in the proper sense of the word"--from the theoretical point of view this is the most important statement Engels makes. After what has been said above, this statement can be fully understood. The Commune was ceasing to be a state in so far as it had to suppress, not the majority of the population, but a minority (the exploiters); it had smashed the bourgeois state machine; in place of a special repressive force, the population itself came on the scene. All this was a departure from the state in the proper sense of the word. And had the Commune become firmly established, all traces of the state in it would have "withered away" of themselves; it would not have had to "abolish" the institutions of the state--they would have ceased to function in the measure that they ceased to have anything to do.

¶7 "The 'people's state' has been thrown in our faces by the anarchists." In saying this, Engels above all has in mind Bakunin and his attacks on the German Social-Democrats. Engels admits that these attacks were justified in so far as the "people's state" was as much an absurdity and as such a departure from socialism as the "free people's state." Engels tried to put the struggle of the German Social Democrats against the anarchists on the right lines, to make this struggle correct in principle, to purge it of opportunist prejudices concerning the "state." Alas! Engels' letter lay in hiding for thirty-six years. We shall see further on that, even after this letter was published, Kautsky obstinately repeated what in essence were the very mistakes against which Engels had warned.

§3. Letter to Bebel

¶1-3. How does Lenin appraise Engels' letter to Bebel? How long did Bebel sit on it? Of what criticism was it part? Why does Engels say the whole talk about the state should be dropped? How does Engels reply to the anarchists on the "people's state?" Why is it pure nonsense to talk of a free people's state? What is the relation between freedom and the state? What word does he suggest instead? Where did Marx stand?

¶4-7. How would the present-day opportunists react to such a correction? Who will do what? What is the correct attitude toward the advice of Marx and Engels? What is the most important statement Engels makes? Why was the Commune ceasing to be a state? Why would the Commune not have "abolished" the state? To what extent were the attacks of the anarchists on the German Social-Democrats justified? What did Engels try to do about it? What happened?

¶8 Bebel replied to Engels in a letter, dated September 21, 1875, in which he wrote, among other things, that he "fully agreed" with Engels' judgment on the draft programme, and that he had reproached Liebknecht for his readiness to make concessions (p. 334 of the German edition of Bebel's memoirs, Vol. II). But if we take Bebel's pamphlet, Our Aims, we find there views on the state that are absolutely wrong:

"The state must be transformed from one based on class rule into a peoples' state."
(Unsere Ziele, German edition, 1886, p. 14.)

¶9 This was printed in the ninth (the ninth!) edition of Bebel's pamphlet! It is not surprising that so persistently repeated opportunist views on the state were absorbed by the German Social-Democrats, especially as Engels' revolutionary interpretations had been safely placed in hiding, and all the conditions of life were such as to "wean" them from revolution for a long time.

4. CRITICISM OF THE DRAFT OF THE ERFURT PROGRAMME

¶1 In analysing the Marxist teaching on the state, the criticism of the draft of the Erfurt Programme,²¹ sent by Engels to Kautsky on June 29, 1891, and published only ten years later in the Neue Zeit, cannot be ignored; for it is precisely with the opportunist views of Social-Democracy on questions of the state system that this criticism is mainly concerned.

¶2 We shall note in passing that Engels also makes an exceedingly valuable observation on questions of economics, which shows how attentively and thoughtfully he watched the various changes being undergone by modern capitalism, and how for this reason he was able to foresee to a certain extent the tasks of our present, the imperialist, epoch. Here is the passage: referring to the word "planlessness" (Planlosigkeit) used in the draft programme, as characteristic of capitalism, Engels writes:

". . . when we pass on from joint-stock companies to trusts, which dominate and monopolize whole branches of industry, this puts an end not only to private production but also to planlessness." (Neue Zeit, Vol. XX, I, 1901-02, p. 8.)

¶3 Here we have what is most essential in the theoretical appraisal of the most modern capitalism, i.e., imperialism, namely, that capitalism becomes monopoly capitalism. The latter must be emphasized because the erroneous bourgeois reformist assertion that monopoly capitalism or state-monopoly capitalism is no longer capitalism, but can already be termed "state socialism," or something of that sort, is most widespread. The trusts, of course, never produced, do not now produce, and cannot produce complete planning. But however much they do plan, however much the capitalist magnates calculate in advance the volume of production on a national and even on an international scale, and however much they systematically regulate it, we still remain under capitalism--in its new stage, it is true, but still, undoubtedly, capitalism. The "proximity" of such capitalism to socialism should serve the genuine representatives of the proletariat as an argument proving the proximity, facility, feasibility and urgency of the socialist revolution, and not at all as an argument for tolerating the repudiation of such a revolution and the efforts to make capitalism look more attractive, an occupation in which all the reformists are engaged.

¶4 But let us return to the question of the state. In this letter Engels makes three particularly valuable points: first, as regards the republic; second, as regards the connection between the national question and the state system, and, third, as regards local self-government.

¶5 As regards the republic, Engels made this the center of gravity of his criticism of the draft of the Erfurt Programme. And when we recall what importance the Erfurt Programme acquired for the whole of international Social-Democracy, and how it became the model for the whole of the Second International, we may state without exaggeration that Engels here criticized the opportunism of the whole Second International.

"The political demands of the draft," Engels writes, "have one great fault. What actually ought to be said is not there." (Engels' italics.)

¶8-9. How did Bebel reply to Engels? What did he put in his pamphlet? What became of Engels' revolutionary interpretations?

§4. Criticism of the Draft of the Erfurt Program

¶1-2. How long did publication of Engels' criticism take? With what was his criticism mainly concerned? What economic changes was Engels able to foresee in 1891? What transition did Engels note, and to what effect?

¶3. What is most essential in the theoretical appraisal of modern capitalism? What erroneous bourgeois reformist notion is widespread? What remains, regardless of the extent of capitalist planning? What conditions does Lenin note? How does the "proximity" of such capitalism to socialism serve the genuine representatives of the proletariat? How does it not?

¶4-5. How many points does Engels make in regards to the state? What is the place and significance of his criticism on the republic? What does he say of the draft?

¶6 And, later on, he makes it clear that the German constitution is properly speaking a copy of the extremely reactionary constitution of 1850, that the Reichstag is only, as Wilhelm Liebknecht put it, "the fig-leaf of absolutism," and that to wish "to transform all the instruments of labour into public property" on the basis of a constitution which legalizes petty states and the union of the petty German states is an "obvious absurdity."

¶7 "To touch on that is dangerous, however," Engels adds, knowing full well that it was impossible legally to include in the programme the demand for a republic in Germany. But Engels does not simply rest content with this obvious consideration which satisfies "everybody." He continues: "Nevertheless, somehow or other, the thing has to be attacked. How necessary this is is shown precisely at the present time by opportunism, which is gaining ground [einreissende] in a large section of the Social-Democratic press. Fearing a renewal of the Anti-Socialist Law, or recalling all manner of over-hasty pronouncements made during the reign of that law, they now want the Party to find the present legal order in Germany adequate for putting through all Party demands by peaceful means."

¶8 Engels particularly stresses the fundamental fact that the German Social-Democrats were prompted by fear of a renewal of the Anti-Socialist Law, and without hesitation calls this opportunism; he declares that precisely because there was no republic and no freedom in Germany, the dreams of a "peaceful" path were absolutely absurd. Engels is sufficiently careful not to tie his hands. He admits that in republican or very free countries "one can conceive" (only "conceive!") of a peaceful development towards socialism, but in Germany, he repeats:

"... in Germany, where the government is almost omnipotent and the Reichstag and all other representative bodies have no real power, to proclaim such a thing in Germany, when, moreover, there is no need to do so, means removing the fig-leaf from absolutism and becoming oneself a screen for its nakedness."

¶9 The great majority of the official leaders of the German Social-Democratic Party, who pigeonholed this advice, have indeed proved to be a screen for absolutism.

"In the long run such a policy can only lead one's own Party astray. They push general, abstract political questions into the foreground, thereby concealing the immediate concrete questions, which at the moment of the first great events, of the first political crisis, automatically pose themselves. What can result from this except that at the decisive moment the Party suddenly proves helpless and that uncertainty and discord on the most decisive issues reign in it because these issues have never been discussed? . . .

"This forgetting of the great, the principal considerations for the momentary interests of the day, this struggling and striving for the success of the moment regardless of later consequences, this sacrifice of the future of the movement for its present, may be 'honestly' meant, but it is and remains opportunism, and 'honest' opportunism is perhaps the most dangerous of all! . . .

"... If one thing is certain it is that our Party and the working class can only come to power under the form of the democratic republic. This is even the specific form for the dictatorship of the proletariat, as the Great French Revolution has already shown."

¶10 Engels repeats here in a particularly striking form the fundamental idea which runs like a red thread through all of Marx's works, namely, that the democratic republic is the nearest approach to the dictatorship of the proletariat. For such a republic--without in the least abolishing the rule of capital, and, therefore, the oppression of the masses and the class struggle--inevitably leads to such an extension, development, unfolding and intensification of this struggle that, as soon as there arises the possibility of satisfying the fundamental interests of the oppressed masses, this possibility is realized inevitably and solely through the dictatorship of the proletariat, through the leadership of those masses by the proletariat. These, too, are "forgotten words" of Marxism for the whole of the Second International, and the fact that they have been forgotten was demonstrated with particular vividness by the history of the Menshevik Party during the first half year of the Russian revolution of 1917.

¶11 On the subject of a federal republic, in connection with the national composition of the population, Engels wrote:

"What should take the place of present-day Germany?" [with its reactionary monarchical constitution and its equally reactionary division into petty states, a division which perpetuates all the specific features of "Prussianism" instead of dissolving them in Germany as a whole]. "In my view, the proletariat can only use the form of the republic one and indivisible. In the gigantic territory of the United States, the federal republic is still, on the whole, a necessity, although in

¶6-8. How does Engels assess the German constitution? What criticism does he raise on this basis? What is necessary in spite of state repression? What shows the necessity? What do the opportunists want out of fear of repression? What fundamental fact does Engels particularly stress? What thing only is permissible concerning the peaceful development of socialism? What was true of Germany, and what conclusion does Engels draw?

¶9. What did the opportunists do with Engels advice? What followed? What consequences of the opportunists' policy does Engels criticize? What features of opportunism does Engels note? What is perhaps the most dangerous form of opportunism? What one thing is certain? Based on what?

¶10-11. What does Marx say of the democratic republic? Does it abolish the rule of capital? To what things does it lead? How are the fundamental interests of the oppressed realized? How did the opportunists treat these questions? What did Engels think had to be overcome in Germany? What form only did he think the proletariat could use there? What distinguishes the unitary state from the union state? What processes did he think were needed in Germany?

the Eastern states it is already becoming a hindrance. It would be a step forward in Britain where the two islands are peopled by four nations and in spite of a single Parliament three different systems of legislation already exist side by side. In little Switzerland, it has long been a hindrance, tolerable only because Switzerland is content to be a purely passive member of the European state system. For Germany, federalization on the Swiss model would be an enormous step backward. Two points distinguish a union state from a unitary state: first, that each member state, each canton, has its own civil and criminal legislation and judicial system, and, second, that alongside a popular chamber there is also a federal chamber in which each canton, whether large or small, votes as such." In Germany the union state constitutes the transition to the completely unitary state, and the "revolution from above" of 1866 and 1870 must not be reversed but supplemented by a "movement from below."

¶12 Far from displaying indifference in regard to the forms of state, Engels, on the contrary, tried to analyse the transitional forms with the utmost thoroughness in order to judge, in accordance with the concrete, historical, specific features of each separate case, from what and to what the given transitional form is passing.

¶13 Proceeding from the point of view of the proletariat and the proletarian revolution Engels, like Marx, upheld democratic centralism, the republic one and indivisible. He regarded the federal republic either as an exception and a hindrance to development, or as a transition from a monarchy to a centralized republic, as a "step forward" under certain special conditions. And among these special conditions, the national question comes to the front.

¶14 Although mercilessly criticizing the reactionary nature of small states, and the veiling of this reactionary nature by the national question in certain concrete cases, Engels, like Marx, never betrayed any trace of a desire to brush aside the national question--a desire of which the Dutch and Polish Marxists are often guilty, proceeding from their perfectly justified struggle against the narrow philistine nationalism of "their" little states.

¶15 Even in regard to Britain, where geographical conditions, a common language and the history of many centuries would seem to have "put an end" to the national question in these separate small divisions of the country--even in regard to that country, Engels reckoned with the plain fact that the national question was not yet a thing of the past, and recognized in consequence that the establishment of a federal republic would be a "step forward." Of course, there is not the slightest hint here of Engels abandoning the criticism of the shortcomings of a federal republic or abandoning the most determined propaganda and struggle for a unified, centralized-democratic republic.

¶16 But Engels did not at all understand democratic centralism in the bureaucratic sense in which this term is used by bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideologists, the anarchists among the latter. His idea of centralism did not in the least preclude such broad local self-government as would combine the voluntary defence of the unity of the state by the "communes" and provinces with the complete abolition of all bureaucratic practices and all "ordering" from above. Developing the programmatic views of Marxism on the state, Engels wrote:

¶17" So, then, a unitary republic. But not in the sense of the present French Republic, which is nothing but the Empire without the Emperor, established in 1798. From 1792 to 1798 each French department, each commune [Gemeinde], enjoyed complete self-government on the American model, and this is what we too must have. How self government is to be organized and how we can manage without a bureaucracy has been shown to us by America and the First French Republic, and is being shown even today by Australia, Canada and other English colonies. And a provincial and communal self-government of this type is far freer than, for instance, Swiss federalism, under which, it is true, the canton is very independent in relation to the Confederation [i.e., the federated state as a whole], but is also independent in relation to the district [Bezirk] and the commune. The cantonal governments appoint the district governors [Statthalter] and prefects, which is unknown in English-speaking countries and which we want to abolish here as resolutely in the future as the Prussian Landrate and Regierungsräte [commissioners, district police chiefs, governors, and in general all officials appointed from above]." Accordingly, Engels proposes the following wording for the self-government clause in the programme: "Complete self-government in the provinces [gubernias or regions], districts and communes through officials elected by universal suffrage. The abolition of all local and provincial authorities appointed by the state."

¶18 I have already had occasion to point out--in Pravda (No. 68, May 28, 1917),²² which was suppressed by the government of Kerensky and other "socialist" ministers--how on this point (of course, not on this point alone by any means) our pseudo-socialist representatives of pseudo-revolutionary pseudo-democracy have made glaring departures from democracy. Naturally, people who have bound themselves by a "coalition" with the imperialist bourgeoisie have remained deaf to this criticism.

¶12-13. How did Engels analyze the forms of the state? What did he judge? Why did he uphold the unitary republic? What special condition comes to the front?
 ¶14-15. How do small states veil their reactionary nature? What error do Marxists of small countries sometimes make, and why? Why did Engels think a federal republic would be a step forward in Britain? Did this mean changing the aims of revolutionaries on the form of the state?
 ¶16-18. How do the petty-bourgeois ideologists understand centralism? What was Engels' understanding of the term? What was true at the time of America, etc.? Did he find the Swiss federation a model of freedom? How did he envision self-government? How did the Russian "socialists" stand on democracy? Why were they deaf to criticism?

¶19 It is extremely important to note that Engels, armed with facts, disproves by a most precise example the prejudice which is very widespread, particularly among petty-bourgeois democrats, that a federal republic necessarily means a greater amount of freedom than a centralized republic. This is wrong. It is disproved by the facts cited by Engels regarding the centralized French Republic of 1792-98 and the federal Swiss Republic. The really democratic centralized republic gave more freedom than the federal republic. In other words, the greatest amount of local, provincial and other freedom known in history was accorded by a centralized and not by a federal republic.

¶20 Insufficient attention has been and is being paid in our Party propaganda and agitation to this fact, as, indeed, to the whole question of the federal and the centralized republic and local self-government.

5. THE 1891 PREFACE TO MARX'S THE CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE

¶1 In his introduction to the third edition of The Civil War in France (this introduction is dated March 18, 1891, and was originally published in the Neue Zeit), Engels, in addition to some interesting incidental remarks on questions concerning the attitude towards the state, gives a remarkably vivid summary of the lessons of the Commune.²³ This summary, rendered more profound by the entire experience of the twenty years that separated the author from the Commune, and directed particularly against the "superstitious belief in the state" so widespread in Germany, may justly be called the last word of Marxism on the question under consideration.

¶2 In France, Engels observes, the workers emerged with arms from every revolution; "therefore, the disarming of the workers was the first commandment for the bourgeois, who were at the helm of the state. Hence, after every revolution won by the workers, a new struggle, ending with the defeat of the workers."

¶3 This summary of the experience of bourgeois revolutions is as concise as it is expressive. The essence of the matter--also, by the way, on the question of the state (has the oppressed class arms?)--is here remarkably well grasped. It is precisely this essence which is most often evaded both by professors who are influenced by bourgeois ideology, and by petty-bourgeois democrats. In the Russian revolution of 1917, the honor (Cavaignac²⁴ honour) of blabbing this secret of bourgeois revolutions fell to the "Menshevik," "also-Marxist," Tsereteli. In his "historic" speech of June 11, Tsereteli blurted out that the bourgeoisie was determined to disarm the Petrograd workers--presenting, of course, this decision as his own, and as a matter of necessity for the "state" in general!

¶4 Tsereteli's historic speech of June 11 will, of course, serve every historian of the revolution of 1917 as one of the most striking illustrations of how the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik bloc, led by Mr. Tsereteli, went over to the side of the bourgeoisie against the revolutionary proletariat.

¶5 Another incidental remark of Engels', also concerning the question of the state, deals with religion. It is well known that German Social-Democracy, as it decayed and became more and more opportunist, slipped more and more frequently into the philistine misinterpretation of the celebrated formula: "Religion is to be proclaimed a private matter." That is, this formula was twisted to mean that religion was a private matter even for the party of the revolutionary proletariat! It was against this complete betrayal of the revolutionary programme of the proletariat that Engels vigorously protested. In 1891 he saw only the very feeble beginnings of opportunism in his Party, and, therefore, he expressed himself with extreme caution:

¶6 "As almost only workers, or recognized representatives of the workers, sat in the Commune, its decisions bore a decidedly proletarian character. Either these decisions decreed reforms which the republican bourgeoisie had failed to pass solely out of cowardice, but which provided a necessary basis for the free activity of the working class--such as the realization of the principle that in relation to the state, religion is a purely private matter-- or the Commune promulgated decrees which were in the direct interest of the working class and in part cut deeply into the old order of society."

¶7 Engels deliberately underlined the words "in relation to the state," as a straight thrust at German opportunism, which had declared religion to be a private matter in relation to the Party, thus degrading the party of the revolutionary proletariat to the level of the most vulgar "free-thinking" philistinism, which is prepared to allow a non-denominational status, but which renounces the Party struggle against the opium of religion which stupefies the people.

¶8 The future historian of German Social-Democracy, in tracing the roots of its shameful bankruptcy in 1914, will find a good deal of interesting material on this question, beginning with the evasive declarations in the articles of the Party's ideological leader Kautsky, which open wide the door to opportunism, and ending with the attitude of the Party towards the "Los-von-der-Kirche-Bewegung" (the leave-the-church movement) in 1913.

¶19-20. What petty-bourgeois prejudice does Engels disprove, and how? What does he prove? How did Party propaganda stand on this question?

¶5. The 1891 Preface to Marx's The Civil War in France

¶1-4. What renders Engels' 1891 summary of the experience of the Commune more profound? What was the first commandment of the bourgeoisie following every revolution, and to what result? In what does Engels present the essence of the state? Who evades this question? Who was Tsereteli and what was his stand?

¶5-8. What proletarian stand on religion was twisted by the opportunists and how? What kinds of decisions of the Commune does Engels note? Of which type was the statement on religion? What is the distinction in regard to the party and the state? What stand did the opportunists take? What part did Kautsky play?

¶9 But let us see how, twenty years after the Commune, Engels summed up its lessons for the fighting proletariat.

¶10 Here are the lessons to which Engels attached prime importance:

¶11 "It was precisely the oppressing power of the former centralized government--the army, political police and bureaucracy which Napoleon had created in 1798 and which since then had been taken over by every new government as a welcome instrument and used against its opponents--it was precisely this power which was to fall everywhere, just as it had already fallen in Paris.

"From the very outset the Commune was compelled to recognize that the working class, once come to power, could not go on managing with the old state machine; that in order not to lose again its only just conquered supremacy, this working class must, on the one hand, do away with all the old repressive machinery previously used against itself, and, on the other, safeguard itself against its own deputies and officials, by declaring them all, without exception, subject to recall at any moment."

¶12 Engels emphasizes again and again that not only under a monarchy, but also in the democratic republic the state remains a state, i.e., it retains its fundamental characteristic feature of transforming the officials, the "servants of society," its organs, into the masters of society.

"Against this transformation of the state and the organs of the state from servants of society into masters of society--an inevitable transformation in all previous states -- the Commune made use of two infallible means. In the first place, it filled all posts--administrative, judicial and educational--by election on the basis of universal suffrage of all concerned, subject to the right of recall at any time by the same electors. And, in the second place, all officials, high or low, were paid only the wages received by other workers. The highest salary paid by the Commune to anyone was 6,000 francs.* In this way an effective barrier to place-hunting and careerism was set up, even apart from the binding mandates to delegates to representative bodies which were added besides."

[* Nominally about 2,400 rubles or, according to the present rate of exchange, about 6,000 rubles. The action of those Bolsheviks who propose that a salary of 9,000 rubles be paid to members of municipal councils, for instance, instead of a maximum salary of 6,000 rubles--quite an adequate sum--throughout the state is totally inexcusable.]

¶13 Engels here approaches the interesting boundary line at which consistent democracy, on the one hand, is transformed into socialism, and on the other, demands socialism. For, in order to put an end to the state, the functions of the government services must be converted into the simple operations of control and accounting that are within the capacity and ability of the vast majority of the population, and, subsequently, of every individual. And in order to abolish careerism completely it must be made impossible for "honourable" though profitless posts in the public service to be used as a springboard to highly lucrative posts in banks or joint-stock companies, as constantly happens in all the freest capitalist countries.

¶14 But Engels did not make the mistake some Marxists make in dealing, for example, with the question of the right of nations to self-determination, when they argue that this is impossible under capitalism and will be superfluous under socialism. Such a seemingly clever but actually incorrect argument might be made in regard to any democratic institution, including moderate salaries for officials, because fully consistent democracy is impossible under capitalism, and under socialism all democracy withers away.

¶15 It is a sophistry like the old joke as to whether a man will become bald if he loses one more hair.

¶16 To develop democracy to the utmost, to seek out the forms for this development, to test them by practice, and so forth--all this is one of the component tasks of the struggle for the social revolution. Taken separately, no kind of democracy will bring socialism. But in actual life democracy will never be "taken separately"; it will be "taken together" with other things, it will exert its influence on economic life as well, will stimulate its transformation; and in its turn it will be influenced by economic development, and so on. Such is the dialectics of living history.

¶9-12. What happened to the oppressing power of the state under every new government? What was to happen to it under the Commune? What did the Commune recognize in regard to the old state? How was it to safeguard itself? What is fundamental to the exploiter class state? Does the form matter? What means did the Commune take against this feature? Were the Bolsheviks unaffected by opportunism?

¶13-16. What boundary does Engels approach? How is the state to be put to an end? How must careerism be abolished? What mistake on this question must be avoided? To what range of questions does Lenin's warning apply, and why? What don't the opportunists want under socialism? How does the old joke apply? What is the dialectics of living history?

"This shattering [Sprengung] of the former state power and its replacement by a new and truly democratic one is described in detail in the third section of The Civil War. But it was necessary to dwell briefly here once more on some of its features, because in Germany particularly the superstitious belief in the state has been carried over from philosophy into the general consciousness of the bourgeoisie and even of many workers. According to the philosophical conception, the state is the 'realization of the Idea,' or the Kingdom of God on earth, as translated into philosophical terms, the sphere in which eternal truth and justice is or should be realized. And from this follows a superstitious reverence for the state and everything connected with it, which takes root the more readily since people are accustomed from childhood to imagine that the affairs and interests common to the whole of society could not be looked after otherwise than as they have been looked after in the past, that is, through the state and its lucratively positioned officials. And people think they have taken quite an extraordinarily bold step forward when they have rid themselves of belief in hereditary monarchy and swear by the democratic republic. In reality, however, the state is nothing but a machine for the oppression of one class by another, and indeed in the democratic republic no less than in the monarchy; and at best an evil inherited by the proletariat after its victorious struggle for class supremacy, whose worst sides the victorious proletariat, just like the Commune, cannot avoid having to lop off at once as much as possible until such time as a generation reared in new, free social conditions is able to throw out the entire lumber of the state."

¶18 Engels warned the Germans not to forget the fundamentals of socialism on the question of the state in connection with the substitution of a republic for the monarchy. His warnings now read like a veritable lesson to Messrs. the Tseretelis and Chernovs, who in their "coalition" practice here revealed a superstitious belief in, and a superstitious reverence for, the state!

¶19 Two more remarks. 1. Engels' statement that in a democratic republic, "no less" than in a monarchy, the state remains a "machine for the oppression of one class by another" by no means signifies that the form of oppression is a matter of indifference to the proletariat, as some anarchists "teach." A wider, freer and more open form of the class struggle and of class oppression enormously assists the proletariat in its struggle for the abolition of classes in general. 2. Why will only a new generation be able to throw out the entire lumber of the state? This question is bound up with that of overcoming democracy, with which we shall deal now.

6. ENGELS ON THE OVERCOMING OF DEMOCRACY

¶1 Engels had occasion to express his views on this subject in connection with the fact that the term "Social-Democrat" was scientifically wrong.

¶2 In a preface to an edition of his articles of the seventies on various subjects, mainly on "international" questions (Internationales aus dem "Volksstaat" 25), dated January 3, 1894, i.e., written a year and a half before his death, Engels wrote that in all his articles he used the word "Communist," and not "Social-Democrat," because at that time the Proudhonists in France and the Lassalleans in Germany called themselves Social-Democrats.

"For Marx and myself," continues Engels, "it was therefore absolutely impossible to use such an elastic term to characterize our special point of view. Today things are different, and the word ["Social-Democrat"] may perhaps pass muster [mag passieren], inexact [unpassend-unsuitable] though it still is for a party whose economic programme is not merely socialist in general, but outright communist, and whose ultimate political aim is to overcome the whole state and, consequently, democracy as well. The names of real [Engels' italics] political parties, however, are never wholly appropriate; the party develops while the name stays." 26

¶17. How extensive in Germany is the superstitious belief in the state? To what conception does Engels refer? How does it take root? What is the state in reality? What must the proletariat do?

¶18-19. Against what does Engels warn? What do the opportunists do? What does Engels say about the democratic republic? What does his statement <not> mean? Why is the form of the state important? Why will only a new generation be able to throw out the state? What question arises?

¶6. Engels on the Overcoming of Democracy

¶1-2. How did Engels regard the term "Social-Democrat" in the 1870s, and why? How did he regard the term in the 1890s, and why? Why are the names of real political parties never wholly appropriate?

¶3 The dialectician Engels remains true to dialectics to the end of his days. Marx and I, he says, had a splendid, scientifically exact name for the Party, but there was no real party, i.e., no mass proletarian party. Now (at the end of the nineteenth century) there is a real party, but its name is scientifically incorrect. Never mind, it will "pass muster," if only the Party develops, if only the scientific inexactness of its name is not hidden from it and does not hinder its development in the correct direction!

¶4 Perhaps some wit would console us Bolsheviks in the manner of Engels: we have a real party, it is developing splendidly; even such a meaningless and ugly term as "Bolshevik" will "pass muster," although it expresses nothing whatever but the purely accidental fact that at the Brussels-London Congress of 1903 we were in the majority....²⁷ Perhaps, now that the persecution of our Party by republicans and "revolutionary" petty-bourgeois democracy in July and August has earned the name "Bolshevik" such universal popular respect, now that, in addition, this persecution attests to the tremendous historical progress our Party has made in its real development--perhaps now even I might hesitate to insist on the suggestion I made in April to change the name of our Party. Perhaps I would propose a "compromise" to my comrades, namely, to call ourselves the Communist Party, but to retain the word "Bolsheviks" in brackets. . . .

¶5 But the question of the name of the Party is incomparably less important than the question of the attitude of the revolutionary proletariat to the state.

¶6 In the usual arguments about the state, the mistake is constantly made against which Engels warned here and which we have in passing indicated above, namely, it is constantly forgotten that the abolition of the state means also the abolition of democracy, that the withering away of the state means the withering away of democracy.

¶7 At first sight this assertion seems exceedingly strange and incomprehensible; indeed, someone or other may even begin to fear that we are expecting the advent of an order of society in which the principle of the subordination of the minority to the majority will not be observed--for democracy means the recognition of just this principle.

¶8 No, democracy is not identical with the subordination of the minority to the majority. Democracy is a state which recognizes the subordination of the minority to the majority, i.e., an organization for the systematic use of violence by one class against another, by one section of the population against another.

¶9 We set ourselves the ultimate aim of doing away with the state, i.e., all organized and systematic violence, all use of violence against people in general. We do not expect the advent of an order of society in which the principle of the subordination of the minority to the majority will not be observed. But in striving for socialism we are convinced that it will develop into communism and, hence, that the need for violence against people in general, for the subordination of one person to another, and of one section of the population to another, will vanish altogether since people will become accustomed to observing the elementary conditions of social life without violence and without subordination.

¶10 In order to emphasize this element of habit, Engels speaks of a new generation, "reared in new, free social conditions," which will be "able to throw out the entire lumber of the state"--of any kind of state, including the democratic republican state.

¶11 In order to explain this, it is necessary to examine the question of the economic basis of the withering away of the state.

¶3-4. What dialectic of parties and names does Lenin remark? Under what circumstances will an inexact name "pass muster?" What consolation does Lenin expect? How did the name "Bolshevik" earn respect? How was the Party's progress shown? What "compromise" does Lenin suggest?

¶5-8. What is more important than the name of the party? What mistake does Lenin mention? How might this proposition be taken? What principle is recognized by democracy? Why is this principle not identical to democracy?

¶9-11. What is, and what is not, the ultimate aim? What will disappear under communism? How does Engels emphasize the point? How is the point to be explained?

CHAPTER V

THE ECONOMIC BASIS OF THE WITHERING AWAY OF THE STATE

Marx explains this question most thoroughly in his Critique of the Gotha Programme (letter to Bracke, May 5, 1875, which was not published until 1891 when it was printed in the Neue Zeit, Vol. IX, I, and which has appeared in Russian in a separate edition). The polemical part of this remarkable work, which contains a criticism of Lassalleanism, has, so to speak, overshadowed its positive part, namely, the analysis of the connection between the development of communism and the withering away of the state.

1. PRESENTATION OF THE QUESTION BY MARX

¶1 From a superficial comparison of Marx's letter to Bracke of May 5, 1875, with Engels' letter to Bebel of March 28, 1875, which we examined above, it might appear that Marx was much more of a "champion of the state" than Engels, and that there was a very considerable difference of opinion between the two writers on the question of the state.

¶2 Engels suggested to Bebel that all the chatter about the state be dropped altogether, that the word "state" be eliminated from the programme altogether and the word "community" substituted for it. Engels even declared that the Commune was no longer a state in the proper sense of the word. Yet Marx even spoke of the "nature of the future state [Staatswesen] of communist society," i.e., as though he recognized the need for the state even under communism.

¶3 But such a view would be fundamentally wrong. A closer examination shows that Marx's and Engels' views on the state and its withering away were completely identical, and that Marx's expression quoted above refers precisely to this nature of the state [Staatswesen] in the process of its withering away.

¶4 Clearly there can be no question of specifying the moment of the future "withering away"--the more so since it will obviously be a lengthy process. The apparent difference between Marx and Engels is explained by the fact that they dealt with different subjects and pursued different aims. Engels set out to show Bebel graphically, sharply and in broad outline the utter absurdity of the current prejudices concerning the state (shared to no small degree by Lassalle). Marx only touched upon this question in passing, being interested in another subject, namely, the development of communist society.

¶5 The whole theory of Marx is the application of the theory of development--in its most consistent, complete, considered and pithy form--to modern capitalism. Naturally, Marx was faced with the problem of applying this theory both to the forthcoming collapse of capitalism and to the future development of future communism.

¶6 On the basis of what data, then, can the question of the future development of future communism be posed?

¶7 On the basis of the fact that it has its origin in capitalism, that it develops historically out of capitalism, that it is the result of the action of a social force to which capitalism gave birth. There is no trace of an attempt on Marx's part to make up a utopia, to make idle guesses about what cannot be known. Marx poses the question of communism in the same way as a naturalist would pose the question of the development, say, of a new biological variety, once he knew that it had originated in such and such a way and was changing in such and such a definite direction.

Chapter V
The Economic Basis of the
Withering Away of the State

Intro. When was Marx' "Critique" written? What was its positive part?

§1. Presentation of the Question by Marx

¶1-3. What difference between Marx and Engels might be superficially apparent? What did Engels say of the Commune? What was Marx' expression? What does Lenin say about the seeming difference? To what did Marx refer?

¶4-7. For what reasons can there be no question of specifying the moment of "withering away?" What was the actual difference between Marx and Engels? What was Marx' theory and to what did he apply it? On the basis of what data can the question of the future development of communism be posed?

¶8 Marx, first of all, brushes aside the confusion the Gotha Programme brings into the question of the relation between the state and society. He writes:

"'Present-day society' is capitalist society, which exists in all civilized countries, more or less free from medieval admixture, more or less modified by the special historical development of each country, more or less developed. On the other hand, the 'present-day state' changes with a country's frontier. It is different in the Prusso-German Empire from what it is in Switzerland, it is different in England from what it is in the United States. 'The present day state' is, therefore, a fiction. 'Nevertheless, the different states of the different civilized countries, in spite of their manifold diversity of form, all have this in common, that they are based on modern bourgeois society, only one more or less capitalistically developed. They have, therefore, also certain essential features in common. In this sense it is possible to speak of the 'nature of the present-day state [Staatswesen],' in contrast with the future, in which its present root, bourgeois society, will have died off. 'The question then arises: what transformation will the nature of the state [Staatswesen] undergo in communist society? In other words, what social functions will remain in existence there that are analogous to present functions of the state? This question can only be answered scientifically, and one does not get a flea-hop nearer to the problem by a thousandfold combination of the word people with the word state.' 28

¶9 Having thus ridiculed all talk about a "people's state," Marx formulates the question and warns us, as it were, that a scientific answer to it can be secured only by using firmly established scientific data.

¶10 The first fact that has been established with complete exactitude by the whole theory of development, by science as a whole--a fact that was forgotten by the utopians, and is forgotten by the present-day opportunists, who are afraid of the socialist revolution--is that, historically, there must undoubtedly be a special stage, or a special phase, of transition from capitalism to communism.

2. THE TRANSITION FROM CAPITALISM TO COMMUNISM

¶1 Marx continues:

"Between capitalist and communist society lies the period of the revolutionary transformation of the one into the other. There corresponds to this also a political transition period in which the state can be nothing but the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat."

¶2 Marx bases this conclusion on an analysis of the role played by the proletariat in modern capitalist society, on the data concerning the development of this society and the irreconcilability of the antagonistic interests of the proletariat and the bourgeoisie.

¶3 Previously the question was put in this way: in order to achieve its emancipation, the proletariat must overthrow the bourgeoisie, win political power and establish its revolutionary dictatorship.

¶4 Now the question is put somewhat differently: the transition from capitalist society--which is developing towards communism--to a communist society is impossible without a "political transition period," and the state in this period can only be the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat.

¶5 What, then, is the relation of this dictatorship to democracy?

¶6 We have seen that The Communist Manifesto simply places side by side the two concepts: "to raise the proletariat to the position of the ruling class" and "to win the battle of democracy." On the basis of all that has been said above, it is possible to determine more precisely how democracy changes in the transition from capitalism to communism.

¶8. What question does the Gotha program confuse? Why is the "present day state" a fiction? What differs among states? In what sense is it possible to speak of the "nature of the present day state?" In contrast to what? What question arises? How can it be answered, and how not?
¶9-10. How is a scientific answer to the question of the state to be obtained? What is the first fact established? How do the opportunists treat it?

§2. The Transition from Capitalism to Communism

¶1-4. What lies between capitalist and communist society? What is implied of the state? On what does Marx base his analysis? How was the question of the state put previously? How is it put here?

¶5-6. What question arises? How does the Communist Manifesto treat the two concepts? What can further be determined? What limits democracy under capitalism? What is freedom in capitalist society? What is the condition of the modern wage-slaves?

¶7 In capitalist society, providing it develops under the most favorable conditions, we have a more or less complete democracy in the democratic republic. But this democracy is always hemmed in by the narrow limits set by capitalist exploitation, and consequently always remains, in essence, a democracy for the minority, only for the propertied classes, only for the rich. Freedom in capitalist society always remains about the same as it was in the ancient Greek republics: freedom for the slave-owners. Owing to the conditions of capitalist exploitation the modern wage slaves are so crushed by want and poverty that "they cannot be bothered with democracy," "they cannot be bothered with politics"; in the ordinary, peaceful course of events the majority of the population is debarred from participation in public and political life.

¶8 The correctness of this statement is perhaps most clearly confirmed by Germany, precisely because in that country constitutional legality steadily endured for a remarkably long time--for nearly half a century (1871-1914)--and during this period Social-Democracy there was able to achieve far more than in other countries in the way of "utilizing legality," and organized a larger proportion of the workers into a political party than anywhere else in the world.

¶9 What is this largest proportion of politically conscious and active wage slaves that has so far been observed in capitalist society? One million members of the Social-Democratic Party--out of fifteen million wage-workers! Three million organized in trade unions--out of fifteen million!

¶10 Democracy for an insignificant minority, democracy for the rich--that is the democracy of capitalist society. If we look more closely into the machinery of capitalist democracy, we shall see everywhere, in the "petty"--supposedly petty--details of the suffrage (residential qualification, exclusion of women, etc.), in the technique of the representative institutions, in the actual obstacles to the right of assembly (public buildings are not for "beggars"!), in the purely capitalist organization of the daily press, etc., etc.--we shall see restriction after restriction upon democracy. These restrictions, exceptions, exclusions, obstacles for the poor, seem slight, especially in the eyes of one who has never known want himself and has never been in close contact with the oppressed classes in their mass life (and nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine hundredths, of the bourgeois publicists and politicians are of this category); but in their sum total these restrictions exclude and squeeze out the poor from politics, from active participation in democracy.

¶11 Marx grasped this essence of capitalist democracy splendidly, when, in analyzing the experience of the Commune, he said that the oppressed are allowed once every few years to decide which particular representatives of the oppressing class shall represent and repress them in parliament!

¶12 But from this capitalist democracy--that is inevitably narrow and stealthily pushes aside the poor, and is therefore hypocritical and false to the core--forward development does not proceed simply, directly and smoothly towards "greater and greater democracy," as conceived by the liberal professors and petty-bourgeois opportunists. No, forward development, i.e., development towards communism, proceeds through the dictatorship of the proletariat, and cannot do otherwise, for the resistance of the capitalist exploiters cannot be broken by anyone else or in any other way.

¶13 And the dictatorship of the proletariat, i.e., the organization of the vanguard of the oppressed as the ruling class for the purpose of suppressing the oppressors, cannot result merely in an expansion of democracy. Alongside an immense expansion of democracy, which for the first time becomes democracy for the poor, democracy for the people, and not democracy for the moneybags, the dictatorship of the proletariat brings about a series of restrictions on the freedom of the oppressors, the exploiters, the capitalists.

¶14 We must suppress them in order to free humanity from wage slavery, their resistance must be crushed by force; it is clear that where there is suppression, where there is violence, there is no freedom and no democracy.

¶15 Engels expressed this splendidly in his letter to Bebel when he said, as the reader will remember, that the proletariat uses the state "not in the interests of freedom but in order to hold down its adversaries, and as soon as it becomes possible to speak of freedom the state as such ceases to exist."

¶7-8. What country does Lenin cite to prove his point, and why? What did Social Democracy achieve there? What does Lenin conclude?

¶9-10. What is the democracy of capitalist society? How widespread are the "petty" restrictions of capitalist democracy? To whom do these restrictions seem "slight?" To what do they add up? How did Marx state the essence of capitalist democracy?

¶11-12. What is the character of capitalist democracy? How does forward development not proceed? How does it actually proceed? Why? What is the dictatorship of the proletariat? What is its relation to democracy? What else does it bring about?

¶13-15. How is humanity to be freed from wage slavery? How does Engels see the relation between the proletarian state and freedom? What change does democracy undergo in the transition from capitalism to communism? bring about?

¶16 Democracy for the vast majority of the people, and suppression by force, i.e., exclusion from democracy, of the exploiters and oppressors of the people--this is the change democracy undergoes during the transition from capitalism to communism .

¶17 Only in communist society, when the resistance of the capitalists has already been completely crushed, when the capitalists have disappeared, when there are no classes (i.e., when there is no difference between the members of society as regards their relation to the social means of production), only then the state "ceases to exist," and it "becomes possible to speak of freedom." Only then will a really complete democracy become possible and be achieved, a democracy really without any exceptions. And only then will democracy begin to wither away, owing to the simple fact that, freed from capitalist slavery, from the untold horrors, savagery, absurdities and infamies of capitalist exploitation, people will gradually become accustomed to observing the elementary rules of community life that have been known for centuries and repeated for thousands of years in all copybook maxims; they will become accustomed to observing them without force, without coercion, without subordination, without the special apparatus of coercion which is called the state.

¶18 The expression "the state withers away" is very well chosen, for it indicates both the gradualness of the process and its spontaneous nature. Only habit can, and undoubtedly will, have such an effect; for we see around us on millions of occasions how readily people become accustomed to observing the rules of community life that are indispensable to them when there is no exploitation, when there is nothing that rouses indignation, evokes protest and revolt and creates the need for suppression.

¶19 Thus, in capitalist society we have a democracy that is curtailed, wretched, false, a democracy only for the rich, for the minority. The dictatorship of the proletariat, the period of transition to communism, will for the first time create democracy for the people, for the majority, along with the necessary suppression of the minority--the exploiters. Communism alone is capable of giving really complete democracy, and the more complete it is the more quickly will it become unnecessary and wither away of itself.

¶20 In other words, under capitalism we have the state in the proper sense of the word, that is, a special machine for the suppression of one class by another, and, what is more, of the majority by the minority. Naturally, to be successful, such an undertaking as the systematic suppression of the exploited majority by the exploiting minority calls for the utmost ferocity and savagery in carrying out the suppression, it calls for seas of blood, through which mankind makes its way in slavery, serfdom and wage-labour.

¶21 Furthermore, during the transition from capitalism to communism suppression is still necessary, but it is now the suppression of the exploiting minority by the exploited majority.

¶22 A special apparatus, a special machine for suppression, the "state," is still necessary, but this is already a transitional state. It is no longer a state in the proper sense of the word; for the suppression of the minority of exploiters by the majority of the wage slaves of yesterday is comparatively so easy, simple and natural a task that it will entail far less bloodshed than the suppression of the risings of slaves, serfs or wage-laborers, and it will cost mankind far less. And it is compatible with the extension of democracy to such an overwhelming majority of the population that the need for a special machine of suppression will begin to disappear. The exploiters are naturally unable to suppress the people without a highly complex machine for performing this task, but the people can suppress the exploiters even with a very simple "machine," almost without a "machine," without a special apparatus, by the simple organization of the armed masses (such as the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, let us remark, running ahead somewhat).

¶23 Lastly, only communism makes the state completely unnecessary, for there is nobody to be suppressed--"nobody" in the sense of a class, in the sense of a systematic struggle against a definite section of the population. We are not utopians, and do not in the least deny the possibility and inevitability of excesses by individual persons, or the need to suppress such excesses. But, in the first place, no special machine, no special apparatus of suppression is needed for this; it will be done by the armed people itself, as simply and as readily as any crowd of civilized people, even in modern society, interferes to put a stop to a scuffle or to prevent a woman from being assaulted. And, secondly, we know that the fundamental social cause of excesses, which consist in the violation of the rules of community life, is the exploitation of the masses, their want and their poverty. With the removal of this chief cause, excesses will inevitably begin to "wither away." We do not know how quickly and in what succession, but we know that they will wither away. With their withering away the state will also wither away.

¶24 Without indulging in utopias, Marx defined in more detail what can be defined now regarding this future, namely, the difference between the lower and higher phases (levels, stages) of communist society.

¶16-17. Under what conditions will it become possible to speak of freedom? What kind of democracy will then be possible? What will happen to democracy, and why? Why is the expression "the state withers away" well chosen? What part will habit play?

¶18-20. Describe the class dialectics of democracy. What is the relation between communism and democracy? What is the state "in the proper sense of the word?" What is necessary to it? What is still necessary in the transition from capitalism to communism?

¶21. Why is the proletarian state no longer a state in the proper sense of the word? What begins to disappear with the extension of democracy? How do the exploiters and the people differ with respect to the state "machine?"

¶22-24. Why does only communism make the state completely unnecessary? What utopianism does Lenin dismiss? What becomes of the special machine in this respect? What is the fundamental social cause of excesses? What will become of excesses under communism? What else follows? What was Marx able to define about the future? What can be defined now?

3. THE FIRST PHASE OF COMMUNIST SOCIETY

¶1 In the Critique of the Gotha Programme, Marx refutes in detail Lassalle's idea that under socialism the worker will receive the "undiminished" or "full product of his labour." Marx shows that from the whole of the social labour of society there must be deducted a reserve fund, a fund for the expansion of production, for the replacement of the "wear and tear" of machinery, and so on; then, from the means of consumption there must be deducted a fund for the expenses of administration, for schools, hospitals, homes for the aged, and so on.

¶2 Instead of Lassalle's hazy, obscure, general phrase ("the full product of his labour to the worker"), Marx gives a sober estimate of exactly how socialist society will have to manage its affairs. Marx proceeds to make a concrete analysis of the conditions of life of a society in which there will be no capitalism, and says:

"What we have to deal with here [in analyzing the programme of the workers' party] is a communist society, not as it has developed on its own foundations, but, on the contrary, just as it emerges from capitalist society; which is thus in every respect, economically, morally and intellectually, still stamped with the birthmarks of the old society from whose womb it emerges."

¶3 And it is this communist society--a society which has just emerged into the light of day out of the womb of capitalism and which is in every respect stamped with the birthmarks of the old society--that Marx terms the "first," or lower phase of communist society.

¶4 The means of production have already ceased to be the private property of individuals. The means of production belong to the whole of society. Every member of society, performing a certain part of the socially-necessary work, receives a certificate from society to the effect that he has done such and such an amount of work. And with this certificate he receives from the public store of articles of consumption a corresponding quantity of products. After a deduction is made of the amount of labour which goes to the public fund, every worker, therefore, receives from society as much as he has given to it.

¶5 "Equality" apparently reigns supreme.

¶6 But when Lassalle, having in view such a social order (usually called socialism, but termed by Marx the first phase of communism), says that this is "fair distribution," that this is "the equal right of all to an equal product of labour," Lassalle is erring and Marx explains his error.

¶7 "Equal right," says Marx, we indeed have here; but it is still a "bourgeois right," which, like every right, presupposes inequality. Every right is an application of an equal measure to different people who in fact are not alike, are not equal to one another; that is why "equal right" is a violation of equality and injustice. Indeed, everyone, having performed as much social labour as another, receives an equal share of the social product (after the abovementioned deductions).

¶8 But people are not alike: one is stronger, another is weaker; one is married, another is not; one has more children, another has less, and so on. And the conclusion Marx draws is :

". . . with an equal performance of labour, and hence an equal share in the social consumption fund, one will in fact receive more than another, one will be richer than another, and so on. To avoid all these defects, right instead of being equal would have to be unequal."

¶9 Hence, the first phase of communism cannot yet provide justice and equality: differences, and unjust differences, in wealth will remain, but the exploitation of man by man will have become impossible, because it will be impossible to seize the means of production, the factories, machines, land, etc., and make them private property. While smashing Lassalle's petty-bourgeois, vague phrases about "equality" and "justice" in general, Marx shows the course of development of communist society, which is compelled to abolish at first only the "injustice" of the means of production having been seized by individuals, and which is unable at once to eliminate the other injustice, which consists in the distribution of articles of consumption "according to work" (and not according to needs).

§3. The First Phase of Communist Society

¶1-3. What does Marx show in response to Lassalle on the "full product" of labor? How did Marx and Lassalle differ in method? On what foundations must communist society develop? What follows? What are the conditions of the lower phase of communist society?

¶4-6. What happens to the means of production? How does the individual function? What apparently reigns? How does Lassalle describe the situation?

¶7-9. What class character does Marx see in "equal right?" What is unequal about it? How does equality of labor cause inequality? What happens to "right?" What injustices remain in the first phase? What becomes impossible? What injustice can be abolished at once in the first phase? What

¶10 The vulgar economists, including the bourgeois professors and "our" Tugan²⁹ among them, constantly reproach the socialists with forgetting the inequality of people and with "dreaming" of eliminating this inequality. Such a reproach, as we see, only proves the extreme ignorance of Messrs. the bourgeois ideologists.

¶11 Marx not only takes the most precise account of the inevitable inequality of men, but he also takes into account the fact that the mere conversion of the means of production into the common property of the whole of society (commonly called "socialism") does not remove the defects of distribution and the inequality of "bourgeois right" which continues to dominate in so far as products are divided "according to work." Continuing, Marx says:

"But these defects are inevitable in the first phase of communist society as it is when it has just emerged after prolonged birth pangs from capitalist society. Right can never be higher than the economic structure of society and its cultural development conditioned thereby."

¶12 And so, in the first phase of communist society (commonly called socialism) "bourgeois right" is not abolished in its entirety, but only in part, only in proportion to the economic revolution so far attained, i.e., only in respect of the means of production. "Bourgeois right" recognizes them as the private property of individuals. Socialism converts them into common property. To that extent--and to that extent alone--"bourgeois right" falls away.

¶13 However, it continues to exist as far as its other part is concerned; it continues to exist in the capacity of regulator (determining factor) in the distribution of products and the allotment of labour among the members of society. The socialist principle, "He who does not work, neither shall he eat," is already realized; the other socialist principle, "An equal amount of products for an equal amount of labour," is also already realized. But this is not yet communism, and it does not yet abolish "bourgeois right," which gives to unequal individuals, in return for unequal (really unequal) amounts of labour, equal amounts of products.

¶14 This is a "defect," says Marx, but it is unavoidable in the first phase of communism; for if we are not to fall into utopianism, we must not think that having overthrown capitalism people will at once learn to work for society without any standard of right; besides, the abolition of capitalism does not immediately create the economic prerequisites for such a change.

¶15 And there is no other standard than that of "bourgeois right." To this extent, therefore, there still remains the need for a state, which, while safeguarding the public ownership of the means of production, would safeguard equality in labour and equality in the distribution of products.

¶16 The state withers away in so far as there are no longer any capitalists, any classes, and, consequently, no class can be suppressed.

But the state has not yet completely withered away, since there still remains the safeguarding of "bourgeois right," which sanctifies actual inequality. For the state to wither away completely, complete communism is necessary.

4. THE HIGHER PHASE OF COMMUNIST SOCIETY

¶1 Marx continues:

"In a higher phase of communist society, after the enslaving subordination of the individual to the division of labour, and with it also the antithesis between mental and physical labour, has vanished; after labour has become not only a means of life but itself life's prime want; after the productive forces have also increased with the all-round development of the individual, and all the springs of co-operative wealth flow more abundantly--only then can the narrow horizon of bourgeois right be crossed in its entirety and society inscribe on its banners: From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs!"

¶10-12. How do the vulgar bourgeois economists reproach Marx? What does this prove? What arises in the first phase from the inequality of men? Why are these things inevitable? To what extent and in what part is "bourgeois right" at first abolished?

¶13-14. In what capacity does bourgeois right continue to exist? What principles are realized? Why is this not yet communism? Why is this "defect" at first unavoidable? What does the overthrow of capitalism not immediately create?

¶15-17. Why is there still need for a state? What does this state do? To what extent does the state wither away? To what extent does it not/

§4. The Higher Phase of Communist Society
Ch V. §4. The Higher Phase of Communist Society
¶1. What vanishes in the higher phase of communist society? What becomes of labor? Of the productive forces? Of the individual? Only when can bourgeois right be superseded entirely? How does Marx describe this phase?

¶2 Only now can we appreciate to the full the correctness of Engels' remarks in which he mercilessly ridiculed the absurdity of combining the words "freedom" and "state." So long as the state exists there is no freedom. When there will be freedom, there will be no state.

¶3 The economic basis for the complete withering away of the state is such a high stage of development of communism that the antithesis between mental and physical labour disappears, and consequently one of the principal sources of modern social inequality disappears--this source, moreover, cannot on any account be removed immediately by the mere conversion of the means of production into public property, by the mere expropriation of the capitalists.

¶4 This expropriation will create the possibility of a gigantic development of the productive forces. And when we see how incredibly capitalism is already retarding this development, and how much progress could be achieved on the basis of the level of modern technique already attained, we are entitled to say with the fullest confidence that the expropriation of the capitalists will inevitably result in a gigantic development of the productive forces of human society. But how rapidly this development will proceed, how soon it will reach the point of breaking away from the division of labour, of doing away with the antithesis between mental and physical labour, of transforming labour into "life's prime want"--we do not and cannot know.

¶5 That is why we are entitled to speak only of the inevitable withering away of the state, emphasizing the protracted nature of this process and its dependence upon the rapidity of development of the higher phase of communism, and leaving the question of the time required for, or the concrete forms of, the withering away entirely open, because there is no material for answering these questions.

¶6 It will become possible for the state to wither away completely when society gives effect to the rule: "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs," i.e., when people have become so accustomed to observing the fundamental rules of community life and when their labour becomes so productive that they will voluntarily work according to their ability. "The narrow horizon of bourgeois right," by which one is compelled to calculate with the callousness of a Shylock, lest one work half an hour more than somebody else, lest one receive less pay than somebody else--this narrow horizon will then be crossed. There will then be no need for society, in distributing products, to regulate the quantity to be received by each; each will take freely "according to his needs."

¶7 From the bourgeois point of view, it is easy to declare that such a social order is "sheer utopia" and to sneer at the socialists for allegedly promising everyone the right to receive from society, without any control over the labour of the individual citizen, any quantity of truffles, automobiles, pianos, etc. Even to this day, most bourgeois "savants" confine themselves to such sneering, thereby displaying both their ignorance and their mercenary defence of capitalism.

¶8 Ignorance--for it has never entered the head of any socialist to "promise" that the higher phase of the development of communism will arrive; whereas the great socialists, in foreseeing that it will arrive, presuppose not the present productivity of labour and not the present ordinary run of people, who, like the seminary students in Pomyalovsky's stories, are capable of damaging the stocks of public wealth "just for fun," and of demanding the impossible.

¶9 Until the "higher" phase of communism arrives, the socialists demand the strictest control by society and by the state of the measure of labour and the measure of consumption; but this control must start with the expropriation of the capitalists, with the establishment of workers' control over the capitalists, and must be exercised not by a state of bureaucrats, but by a state of armed workers.

¶10 The mercenary defence of capitalism by the bourgeois ideologists (and their hangers-on, like Messrs. the Tseretelis, Chernovs and Co.) consists precisely in that they substitute arguing and talk about the distant future for the vital and burning question of present-day politics, namely, the expropriation of the capitalists, the conversion of all citizens into workers and employees of one huge "syndicate"--the whole state--and the complete subordination of the entire work of this syndicate to a genuinely democratic state, the state of the Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies.

¶11 In essence, when a learned professor, followed by the philistine, followed in turn by Messrs. the Tseretelis and Chernovs, talks of fantastic utopias, of the demagogic promises of the Bolsheviks, of the impossibility of "introducing" socialism, he has in mind the higher stage or phase of communism, which no one has ever promised or even thought to "introduce," because it cannot be "introduced" at all.

¶2-3. Why is it ridiculous to combine the words "freedom" and "state?" What principal source of inequality disappears in the development of communism? What is insufficient toward this end?

¶4-5. How does capitalism affect the development of production? What will result from the expropriation of the capitalists? What cannot be known at this point? Of what only are we entitled to speak, and with what emphasis? For what questions is there no material to give answers?

¶6-8. Under what conditions will it be possible for the state to wither away completely? What characterizes bourgeois right? What will disappear with it? What is the bourgeois point of view? How does Lenin reply to the bourgeois "savants?" Of what are they ignorant? What is presupposed by the great socialists?

¶9-11. What do the socialists demand prior to the "higher" phase of communism? How will control be exercised? Of what does the mercenary defence of capitalists consist? Who raises it? What is the burning question of present-day politics? Of what do the learned professors, et. al., talk? How does Lenin refute them?

¶12 And this brings us to the question of the scientific distinction between socialism and communism, which Engels touched on in his above-quoted argument about the incorrectness of the name "Social-Democrat." Politically the distinction between the first, or lower, and the higher phase of communism will in time, probably, be tremendous; but it would be ridiculous to take cognizance of this distinction now, under capitalism, and only individual anarchists, perhaps, could invest it with primary importance (if there still remain people among the anarchists who have learned nothing from the "Plekhanovite" conversion of the Kropotkins, the Graves, the Cornelissens and other "stars" of anarchism into social-chauvinists or "anarcho-trenchists," as Ghe, one of the few anarchists who have still preserved a sense of honor and a conscience, has put it).

¶13 But the scientific distinction between socialism and communism is clear. What is usually called socialism was termed by Marx the "first," or lower phase of communist society. In so far as the means of production become common property, the word "communism" is also applicable here, providing we do not forget that this is not complete communism. The great significance of Marx's explanations is that here, too, he consistently applies materialist dialectics, the theory of development, and regards communism as something which develops out of capitalism. Instead of scholastically invented, "concocted" definitions and fruitless disputes about words (What is socialism? What is communism?), Marx gives an analysis of what might be called the stages of the economic maturity of communism.

¶14 In its first phase, or first stage, communism cannot as yet be fully mature economically and entirely free from traditions or vestiges of capitalism. Hence the interesting phenomenon that communism in its first phase retains "the narrow horizon of bourgeois right." Of course, bourgeois right in regard to the distribution of articles of consumption inevitably presupposes the existence of the bourgeois state, for right is nothing without an apparatus capable of enforcing the observance of the standards of right.

¶15 It follows that under communism there remains for a time not only bourgeois right, but even the bourgeois state-- without the bourgeoisie!

¶16 This may sound like a paradox or simply a dialectical conundrum, of which Marxism is often accused by people who do not take the slightest trouble to study its extraordinarily profound content.

¶17 But in fact, remnants of the old surviving in the new confront us in life at every step, both in nature and in society. And Marx did not arbitrarily insert a scrap of "bourgeois" right into communism, but indicated what is economically and politically inevitable in a society emerging from the womb of capitalism.

¶18 Democracy is of enormous importance to the working class in its struggle against the capitalists for its emancipation. But democracy is by no means a limit not to be overstepped; it is only one of the stages on the road from feudalism to capitalism, and from capitalism to communism.

¶19 Democracy means equality. The great significance of the proletariat's struggle for equality and of the slogan of equality is clear if we correctly interpret it as meaning the abolition of classes. But democracy means only formal equality. And as soon as equality is achieved for all members of society in relation to ownership of the means of production, that is, equality of labour and equality of wages, humanity will inevitably be confronted with the question of advancing farther, from formal equality to actual equality, i.e., to giving effect to the rule, "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs." By what stages, by means of what practical measures humanity will proceed to this supreme aim--we do not and cannot know. But it is important to realize how infinitely mendacious is the ordinary bourgeois conception of socialism as something lifeless, petrified, fixed once for all, whereas in reality only with socialism there will begin a rapid, genuine, really mass forward movement, embracing first the majority and then the whole of the population, in all spheres of public and private life.

¶12-13. Why is it ridiculous at this time to take cognizance of the political distinction between socialism and communism? Who would speak of it? What distinction is clear, however? To what extent does the word "communism" apply, and with what proviso? In what does the significance of Marx' explanations lie?

¶14-17. What limitations apply to the first stage of communism? What survives of bourgeois right? What is presupposed? Why? What follows? Of what is Marxism often accused, and by whom? How does Lenin reply? What is in fact Marx' method?

¶18-19. In what lies the importance of democracy? What is it not? Of what is it a stage? What is the meaning of democracy? What is its correct interpretation? With what further question will humanity be confronted? What cannot we know? What is the ordinary bourgeois conception of socialism? What

¶20 Democracy is a form of the state, one of its varieties. Consequently, like every state, it represents the organized, systematic use of violence against persons. That is one aspect. But, on the other hand, it signifies the formal recognition of equality of citizens, the equal right of all to determine the structure of the state and to administer it. This, in turn, is tied up with the fact that, at a certain stage in the development of democracy, it first welds together the class that wages a revolutionary struggle against capitalism--the proletariat, and enables it to crush, smash to smithereens, wipe off the face of the earth the bourgeois, even the republican-bourgeois, state machine--the standing army, the police and the bureaucracy--and to substitute for it a more democratic state machine, but a state machine nevertheless, in the shape of the armed masses of workers who develop into a militia in which the entire population takes part.

¶21 Here "quantity turns into quality": such a degree of democracy is tied up with overstepping the bounds of bourgeois society, with the beginning of its socialist reconstruction. If really all take part in the administration of the state, capitalism cannot retain its hold. And the development of capitalism, in its turn, creates the prerequisites that enable really "all" to take part in the administration of the state. Some of these prerequisites are: universal literacy, which has already been achieved in a number of the most advanced capitalist countries, then the "training and disciplining" of millions of workers by the huge, complex, socialized apparatus of the postal service, railways, big factories, large-scale commerce, banking, etc., etc.

¶22 Given these economic prerequisites it is quite possible, after the overthrow of the capitalists and the bureaucrats, to proceed immediately, overnight, to replace them in the control of production and distribution, in the work of keeping account of labour and products, by the armed workers, by the universally armed people. (The question of control and accounting should not be confused with the question of the scientifically trained staff of engineers, agronomists and so on. These gentlemen are working today at the bidding of the capitalists and they will work even better tomorrow at the bidding of the armed workers.)

¶23 Accounting and control--that is the main thing needed to achieve the "smooth working," the correct functioning of the first phase of communist society. All citizens are transformed here into hired employees of the state, which consists in the armed workers. All citizens become employees and workers of a single nationwide state "syndicate." The whole issue is that they should work equally, do their assigned share of work, and get equally paid. The accounting and control necessary for this have been simplified by capitalism to the extreme and reduced to the extraordinarily simple operations--which any literate person can perform-- of supervising and recording, knowledge of the four rules of arithmetic, and issuing appropriate receipts.*

[* When the functions of the state are reduced mainly to such accounting and control by the workers themselves, it will cease to be a "political state" and "public functions will lose their political character and become mere administrative functions" (cf. above, Chapter IV, 2, Engels' "Controversy with the Anarchists").]

¶24 When the majority of the people begin independently and everywhere to keep such accounts and exercise such control over the capitalists (now converted into employees) and over Messrs. the intellectuals who preserve their capitalist ways, this control will really become universal, general and popular; and there will be no getting away from it, there will be "nowhere to go."

¶25 The whole of society will have become a single office and a single factory, with equality of labour and equality of pay.

¶26 But this "factory" discipline, which the proletariat, after defeating the capitalists and overthrowing the exploiters, will extend to the whole of society, is by no means our ideal, nor is it our ultimate goal. It is but a necessary step for radically purging society of all the infamies and abominations of capitalist exploitation, and for further progress.

¶27 From the moment all members of society, or at least the vast majority, have learned to administer the state themselves, have taken this work into their own hands, have "set going" the control over the insignificant minority of capitalists, over the lordlings who wish to preserve their capitalist ways and over the workers who have been profoundly corrupted by capitalism--from this moment the need for government of any kind begins to disappear altogether. The more complete the democracy, the nearer the moment approaches when it becomes unnecessary. The more democratic the "state" which consists of the armed workers, and which is "no longer a state in the proper sense of the word," the more rapidly does every kind of state begin to wither away.

¶20-22. On what aspects of democracy does Lenin touch? What is the content of the workers' struggle for democracy? What happens to the state machine? In what sense does "quantity turn into quality?" How does capitalism lose its hold? For what does capitalism create the prerequisites? What are these prerequisites? What do they enable? What exception does Lenin note? How is it resolved?

¶23-25. What is the main thing need to achieve the "smooth working" of socialism? What becomes of the citizens? What is the main issue? What will become of the "political state?" How will the majority of the people exercise control over the capitalists? Why will there be "no place to go?" What will have become of the whole of society?

¶26-27. What is Lenin's estimate of this "factory" discipline? Why is it necessary? What defines the moment from which the need for government of any kind begins to disappear? What makes democracy unnecessary? What is the basis and the historic process of the more democratic state?

¶28 For when all have learned to administer and actually do independently administer social production, independently keep accounts and exercise control over the parasites, the sons of privilege, the swindlers and suchlike "guardians of capitalist traditions," the escape from this popular accounting and control will inevitably become so incredibly difficult, such a rare exception, and will probably be accompanied by such swift and severe punishment (for the armed workers are practical people and not sentimental intellectuals, and they will scarcely allow anyone to trifle with them), that the necessity of observing the simple, fundamental rules of all human community life will very soon become a habit.

¶29 And then the door will be thrown wide open for the transition from the first phase of communist society to its higher phase, and with it to the complete withering away of the state.

CHAPTER VI THE VULGARIZATION OF MARXISM BY THE OPPORTUNISTS

¶1 The question of the relation of the state to the social revolution, and of the social revolution to the state, like the question of revolution generally, was given very little attention by the most prominent theoreticians and publicists of the Second International (1889-1914). But the most characteristic thing about the process of the gradual growth of opportunism which led to the collapse of the Second International in 1914 is that even when these people were squarely faced with this question they tried to evade it or took no notice of it.

¶2 In general, it may be said that evasiveness as regards the question of the relation of the proletarian revolution to the state--an evasiveness which was to the advantage of opportunism and nurtured it--resulted in the distortion of Marxism and in its complete vulgarization.

¶3 To characterize this lamentable process, if only briefly, we shall take the most prominent theoreticians of Marxism: Plekhanov and Kautsky.

1. PLEKHANOV'S CONTROVERSY WITH THE ANARCHISTS

¶1 Plekhanov wrote a special pamphlet on the relation of anarchism to socialism, Anarchism and Socialism, which was published in German in 1894.

¶2 In treating this subject Plekhanov contrived completely to evade the most urgent, burning, and politically most essential issue in the struggle against anarchism, namely, the relation of revolution to the state, and the question of the state in general! His pamphlet falls into two distinct parts: one of them is historical and literary, and contains valuable material on the history of the ideas of Stirner, Proudhon and others; the other is philistine, and contains a clumsy dissertation on the theme that an anarchist cannot be distinguished from a bandit.

¶3 A most amusing combination of subjects and most characteristic of Plekhanov's whole activity on the eve of the revolution and during the revolutionary period in Russia! Indeed, in the years 1905 to 1917, Plekhanov revealed himself as a semi-doctrinaire and semi-philistine who, in politics, tailed after the bourgeoisie.

¶4 We have seen how, in their controversy with the anarchists, Marx and Engels with the utmost thoroughness explained their views on the relation of revolution to the state. In 1891, in his foreword to Marx's Critique of the Gotha Programme, Engels wrote that "we"--that is, Engels and Marx--were at that time, hardly two years after the Hague Congress of the [First] International,³⁰ engaged in the most violent struggle against Bakunin and his anarchists."

¶5 The anarchists had tried to claim the Paris Commune as their "own," so to say, as a corroboration of their doctrine; and they utterly failed to understand its lessons and Marx's analysis of these lessons. Anarchism has failed to give anything even approximating the true answers to the concrete political questions: Must the old state machine be smashed? And what should be put in its place?

¶6 But to speak of "anarchism and socialism" while completely evading the question of the state, and failing to take note of the whole development of Marxism before and after the Commune, meant inevitably slipping into opportunism. For what opportunism needs most of all is that the two questions just mentioned should not be raised at all. That in itself is a victory for opportunism.

¶28-29. Who would escape from popular accounting? What makes it difficult? What observances will become a habit? What door will be thrown wide open?

Ch VI. The Vulgarization of Marxism by the Opportunists

Intro. ¶1-3. What questions did the theoreticians of the Second International avoid? How did they respond when confronted? What evasiveness was to the advantage of opportunism? What was the result? How does Lenin characterize the process?

¶1. Plekhanov's Controversy with the Anarchists

¶1-3. What subject did Plekhanov treat in 1894? What issue does Plekhanov evade? How does Lenin characterize this issue? What are the two parts of his pamphlet? In what period was this Plekhanov's whole activity? What did Plekhanov reveal himself to be?

¶4-6. What question did Marx and Engels pursue in their controversy with the anarchists? What was the intensity of the struggle? What did the anarchists claim about the Commune? What did they fail to understand? What concrete political question does anarchism fail to cover? How does Lenin criticize the anarchists on method? What was the consequence for them? What does opportunism need most of all? To what effect?

2. KAUTSKY'S CONTROVERSY WITH THE OPPORTUNISTS

¶1 Undoubtedly, an immeasurably larger number of Kautsky's works have been translated into Russian than into any other language. It is not without reason that some German Social-Democrats say in jest that Kautsky is read more in Russia than in Germany (let us say, parenthetically, that there is a far deeper historical significance in this jest than those who first made it suspect: the Russian workers, by advancing in 1905 an extraordinarily great and unprecedented demand for the best works of the best Social-Democratic literature in the world, and by receiving translations and editions of these works in quantities unheard of in other countries, transplanted, so to speak, at an accelerated pace the enormous experience of a neighboring, more advanced country to the young soil of our proletarian movement).

¶2 Besides his popularization of Marxism, Kautsky is particularly known in our country for his controversy with the opportunists, and with Bernstein at their head. But one fact is almost unknown, one which cannot be overlooked if we set ourselves the task of investigating how Kautsky drifted into the morass of unbelievably disgraceful confusion and defence of social-chauvinism during the supreme crisis of 1914-15. This fact is the following: shortly before he came out against the most prominent representatives of opportunism in France (Millerand and Jaures) and in Germany (Bernstein), Kautsky betrayed great vacillation. The Marxist journal, Zarya,³¹ which was published in Stuttgart in 1901-02, and advocated revolutionary proletarian views, was forced to enter into controversy with Kautsky, to characterize as "rubber-like" the half-hearted, evasive resolution, conciliatory towards the opportunists, that he proposed at the International Socialist Congress in Paris in 1900.³² Kautsky's letters published in Germany reveal no less hesitancy on his part before he took the field against Bernstein.

¶3 Of immeasurably greater significance, however, is the fact that, in his very controversy with the opportunists, in his formulation of the question and his manner of treating it, we can now observe, as we investigate the history of Kautsky's latest betrayal of Marxism, his systematic gravitation towards opportunism precisely on the question of the state.

¶4 Let us take Kautsky's first important work against opportunism, his Bernstein and the Social-Democratic Programme. Kautsky refutes Bernstein in detail, but here is a characteristic thing:

Bernstein, in his Premises of Socialism, of Herostratean fame, accuses Marxism of "Blanquism" (an accusation since repeated thousands of times by the opportunists and liberal bourgeois in Russia against the representatives of revolutionary Marxism, the Bolsheviks). In this connection Bernstein dwells particularly on Marx's The Civil War in France, and tries, quite unsuccessfully, as we have seen, to identify Marx's viewpoint on the lessons of the Commune with Proudhon's- Bernstein pays particular attention to the conclusion which Marx emphasized in his 1872 preface to The Communist Manifesto, namely, that "the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery, and wield it for its own purposes."

¶5 This dictum "pleased" Bernstein so much that he repeated it no less than three times in his book--interpreting it in the most distorted, opportunist sense.

¶6 As we have seen, Marx meant that the working class must smash, break Up, shatter (Sprengung--explosion, the expression used by Engels) the whole state machine. But according to Bernstein it would appear as though Marx in these words warned the working class against excessive revolutionary zeal when seizing power.

¶7 A cruder and more hideous distortion of Marx's idea cannot be imagined.

¶8 How, then, did Kautsky proceed in his most detailed refutation of Bernsteinism?

¶9 He refrained from analyzing the full depth of the distortion of Marxism by opportunism on this point. He cited the above-quoted passage from Engels' introduction to Marx's Civil War and said that according to Marx the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery, but that, generally speaking, it can lay hold of it--and that was all. Not a word did Kautsky utter about the fact that Bernstein attributed to Marx the very opposite of Marx's real views, about the fact that since 1852 Marx had formulated the task of the proletarian revolution as being to "smash" the state machine.

¶10 The result was that the most essential difference between Marxism and opportunism on the subject of the tasks of the proletarian revolution was slurred over by Kautsky!

"We can quite safely leave the solution of the problem of the proletarian dictatorship to the future," said Kautsky, writing "against" Bernstein. (P. 172, German edition.)

¶11 This is not a polemic against Bernstein, but, in essence, a concession to him, a surrender of positions to opportunism; for at present the opportunists ask nothing better than to "quite safely leave to the future" all fundamental questions of the tasks of the proletarian revolution.

§2. Kautsky's Controversy with the Opportunists

¶1-3. What is the jest about Kautsky's works? What significance does Lenin see in it? How is Kautsky particularly known in Russia? What is almost unknown, and in pursuit of what task? What fact is cited? How did Zarya criticize Kautsky? How did he behave toward Bernstein? What is of immeasurably greater significance?

¶4. According to Kautsky, what does Bernstein say about the relation between Marx and Proudhon? To what conclusion of Marx does Bernstein pay particular attention?

¶5-7. What did Bernstein do with Marx' dictum? What did Marx mean? How did Bernstein interpret Marx? How does Lenin characterize this?

¶8-11. From what did Kautsky refrain? How far did Kautsky go with Marx? What did Kautsky not raise against Bernstein? What was the result? What is the essence of Kautsky's position? How does this serve opportunism?

¶12 From 1852 to 1891, for forty years, Marx and Engels taught the proletariat that it must smash the state machine. Yet in 1899 Kautsky, confronted with the complete betrayal of Marxism by the opportunists on this point, fraudulently substituted for the question of whether it is necessary to smash this machine the question of the concrete forms in which it is to be smashed, and then sought refuge behind the "indisputable" (and barren) philistine truth that concrete forms cannot be known in advance!!

¶13 A gulf separates Marx and Kautsky as regards their attitudes towards the proletarian party's task of preparing the working class for revolution.

¶14 Let us take the next, more mature, work by Kautsky, which was also, to a considerable extent, devoted to a refutation of opportunist errors. This is his pamphlet, The Social Revolution. In it the author chose as his special theme the question of "the proletarian revolution" and "the proletarian regime." He gave much that was exceedingly valuable, but it was precisely the question of the state that he evaded.

¶15 Throughout the pamphlet the author speaks of the conquest of state power--and no more; that is, he chooses a formula which makes a concession to the opportunists, inasmuch as it admits the possibility of conquering power without destroying the state machine. The very thing which Marx, in 1872, declared to be "antiquated" in the programme of The Communist Manifesto is revived by Kautsky in 1902.

¶16 A special section in the pamphlet is devoted to "the forms and the weapons of the social revolution." Here Kautsky speaks of the mass political strike, of civil war, and of the "instruments of the might of the modern large state, i.e., the bureaucracy and the army"; but not a word does he say about what the Commune had already taught the workers. Evidently, it was not without reason that Engels issued a warning, particularly to the German socialists, against "superstitious reverence" for the state.

¶17 Kautsky sets forth the matter as follows: the victorious proletariat "will carry out the democratic programme," and then he sets forth the clauses of the programme. But not a word does he utter about the new material provided by the year 1871 on the subject of the supersession of bourgeois democracy by proletarian democracy. Kautsky disposes of the question by uttering such "solid" banalities as:

"Still, it goes without saying that we shall not achieve supremacy under the present conditions. Revolution itself presupposes long and deep-going struggles, which, as they proceed, will change our present political and social structure."

¶18 Undoubtedly, this "goes without saying," just as does the truth that horses eat oats, or that the Volga flows into the Caspian Sea. Only it is a pity that an empty and bombastic phrase about "deep-going" struggles is used as a means of evading a question of vital interest to the revolutionary proletariat, namely, what makes its revolution "deep-going" in relation to the state, to democracy, as distinct from previous, non-proletarian revolutions.

¶19 By evading this question, Kautsky in practice makes a concession to opportunism on this most essential point, although in words he declares stern war against it and emphasizes the importance of the "idea of revolution" (how much is this "idea" worth if one is afraid to teach the workers the concrete lessons of revolution?), or says, "revolutionary idealism before everything else," or announces that the English workers are now "hardly more than petty bourgeois."

"The most varied forms of enterprises--bureaucratic [??], trade unionist, co-operative, private... can exist side by side in socialist society," Kautsky writes. ". . . There are, for example, enterprises which cannot do without a bureaucratic [??] organization, such as the railways. Here the democratic organization may take the following shape: the workers elect delegates who form a sort of parliament, which establishes the working regulations and supervises the management of the bureaucratic apparatus. The management of other enterprises may be transferred to the trade unions, and still others may become co-operative enterprises." (Pp. 148 and 115, Russian translation, published in Geneva, 1903.)

¶20 This argument is erroneous; it is a step backward compared with the explanations Marx and Engels gave in the seventies, using the lessons of the Commune as an example. As far as the supposedly necessary "bureaucratic" organization is concerned, there is no difference whatever between a railway and any other enterprise in large-scale machine industry, any factory, large store, or large-scale capitalist agricultural enterprise. The technique of all such enterprises makes absolutely imperative the strictest discipline, the utmost precision on the part of everyone in carrying out his allotted task, for otherwise the whole enterprise may come to a stop, or machinery or the finished product may be damaged. In all such enterprises the workers will, of course, "elect delegates who will form a sort of parliament."

¶12-13. What did Marx and Engels teach for forty years? With what was Kautsky confronted in 1899? With what fraudulent substitutions did he respond? On what task is there a gulf between Marx and Kautsky?

¶14-15. What is the special theme of Kautsky's next pamphlet? How does Lenin judge it? What is Kautsky's formula? How does it make a concession to opportunism? Where does this stand with Marx?

¶16-18. Of what does Kautsky speak in his pamphlet, and of what not? Of what had Engels warned? How does Kautsky set matters forth? Of what does he say nothing? How does Lenin criticize Kautsky's "solid" banalities? What vital questions are evaded?

¶19-20. How does Kautsky make a concession to opportunism? How does he try to hide it? What forms of enterprises and management does he see in socialist society? How does Lenin criticize Kautsky on "bureaucratic" organization? How does he correct Kautsky?

¶21 But the whole point is that this "sort of parliament" will not be a parliament in the sense of a bourgeois-parliamentary institution. The whole point is that this "sort of parliament" will not merely "establish the working regulations and supervise the management of the bureaucratic apparatus," as Kautsky, whose ideas do not go beyond the bounds of bourgeois parliamentarism, imagines. In socialist society the "sort of parliament" consisting of workers' deputies will, of course, "establish the working regulations and supervise the management" of the "apparatus"--but this apparatus will not be "bureaucratic." The workers, having conquered political power, will smash the old bureaucratic apparatus, shatter it to its very foundations, until not a stone is left standing upon another; and they will replace it by a new one, consisting of the very same workers and office employees, against whose transformation into bureaucrats the measures will at once be taken which were specified in detail by Marx and Engels: (1) not only election, but also recall at any time; (2) pay not exceeding that of a workman; (3) immediate introduction of control and supervision by all, so that all! shall become "bureaucrats" for a time and that, therefore, nobody may be able to become a "bureaucrat."

¶22 Kautsky has not reflected at all on Marx's words: "The Commune was to be a working, not a parliamentary, body, executive and legislative at the same time."

¶23 Kautsky has not understood at all the difference between bourgeois parliamentarism, which combines democracy (not for the people) with bureaucracy (against the people), and proletarian democracy, which will take immediate steps to cut off bureaucracy at its root, and which will be able to carry out these measures to the end, to the complete abolition of bureaucracy, to the introduction of complete democracy for the people.

¶24 Kautsky here displays the same old "superstitious reverence" for the state, and "superstitious belief" in bureaucracy.

¶25 Let us now pass on to the last and best of Kautsky's works against the opportunists, his pamphlet The Road to Power (which, I believe, has not been published in Russian, for it appeared when the reaction was at its height here, in 1909). This pamphlet marks a considerable step forward, inasmuch as it does not deal with the revolutionary programme in general, as in the pamphlet of 1899 against Bernstein, or with the tasks of the social revolution irrespective of the time of its occurrence, as in the 1902 pamphlet, The Social Revolution; it deals with the concrete conditions which compel us to recognize that the "era of revolutions" is setting in.

¶26 The author definitely points to the sharpening of class contradictions in general and to imperialism, which plays a particularly important part in this connection. After the "revolutionary period of 1789-1871" in Western Europe, he says, a similar period began in the East in 1905. A world war is approaching with menacing rapidity. "The proletariat can no longer talk of premature revolution." "We have entered a revolutionary period." The "revolutionary era is beginning."

¶27 These declarations are perfectly clear. This pamphlet of Kautsky's should serve as a measure of comparison between what German Social-Democracy promised to be before the imperialist war and the depth to which it--Kautsky himself included--sank when the war broke out. "The present situation," Kautsky wrote in the pamphlet we are examining, "is fraught with the danger that we [i.e., German Social Democracy] may easily appear to be more 'moderate' than we really are." It turned out that in reality the German Social-Democratic Party was much more moderate and opportunist than it appeared to be!

¶28 It is all the more characteristic, therefore, that although Kautsky so definitely declared that the era of revolutions had already begun, he again completely evaded the question of the state in the pamphlet which he himself said was devoted precisely to an analysis of the "political revolution."

¶29 These evasions of the question, these omissions and equivocations, inevitably added up to that complete swing-over to opportunism with which we shall now have to deal.

¶30 German Social-Democracy, in the person of Kautsky, seems to have declared: I abide by revolutionary views (1899), I recognize, in particular, the inevitability of the social revolution of the proletariat (1902), I recognize the advent of a new era of revolutions (1909). Still, I am going back as compared with what Marx said as early as 1852 now that the question of the tasks of the proletarian revolution in relation to the state is being raised (1912).

¶31 It was precisely in this direct form that the question was put in Kautsky's controversy with Pannekoek.

¶21-24. What is the whole point of "this sort of parliament?" What is the limitation of Kautsky's thought? On what basis is bureaucracy eliminated? What measures were specified by Marx and Engels? On what has Kautsky failed to reflect? What is the difference between bourgeois parliamentarism and proletarian democracy? What does proletarian democracy abolish and what does it introduce? What superstitions does Kautsky display?
¶25-27. How does Lenin estimate the last of Kautsky's pamphlets against the opportunists? With what does it not deal? With what does it deal? What did this pamphlet point up? What did it declare? For what comparison does the pamphlet serve? What comparison did Kautsky make? What was the actual state of affairs?
¶28-31. What is all the more characteristic of Kautsky, and why? To what did his errors add up? What was the sequence of Kautsky's views? To what extent was he out of date? What question was put in his controversy with Pannekoek?

3. KAUTSKY'S CONTROVERSY WITH PANNEKOEK

¶ In opposing Kautsky, Pannekoek came out as one of the representatives of the "Left radical" trend which counted in its ranks Rosa Luxemburg, Karl Radek and others. Advocating revolutionary tactics, they were united in the conviction that Kautsky was going over to the position of the "Center," which wavered in an unprincipled manner between Marxism and opportunism. The correctness of this view was fully confirmed by the war, when this "Centrist" (wrongly called Marxist) trend, or Kautskyism, revealed itself in all its repulsive wretchedness.

¶2 In an article touching on the question of the state, entitled "Mass Action and Revolution" (Neue Zeit, 1912, Vol. XXX, 2), Pannekoek described Kautsky's attitude as one of "passive radicalism," as "a theory of inactive expectancy." "Kautsky refuses to see the process of revolution." (P. 616.) In presenting the matter in this way, Pannekoek approached the subject which interests us, namely, the tasks of the proletarian revolution in relation to the state.

"The struggle of the proletariat," he wrote, "is not merely a struggle against the bourgeoisie for state power, but a struggle against state power.... The content of this [the proletarian] revolution is the destruction and dissolution [Auflosung] of the instruments of power of the state by the instruments of power of the proletariat.... The struggle will cease only when, as the result of it, the state organization is entirely destroyed. The organization of the majority will then have demonstrated its superiority by destroying the organization of the ruling minority." (P. 548.)

¶3 The formulation in which Pannekoek presented his ideas suffers from serious defects, but its meaning is clear nonetheless; and it is interesting to note how Kautsky went about refuting it.

"Up to now," he wrote, "the antithesis between the Social-Democrats and the anarchists has been that the former wished to conquer state power while the latter wished to destroy it. Pannekoek wants to do both." (P. 724.)

¶4 Although Pannekoek's exposition lacks precision and concreteness--not to speak of other shortcomings of his article which have no bearing on the present subject--Kautsky seized precisely on the essential point of principle involved, raised by Pannekoek; and on this fundamental question of principle Kautsky completely abandoned the Marxist position and went over wholly to opportunism. His definition of the distinction between the Social-Democrats and the anarchists is absolutely wrong, and he utterly distorts and vulgarizes Marxism.

¶5 The distinction between the Marxists and the anarchists is this: (1) The former, aiming at the complete destruction of the state, recognize that this aim can only be achieved after classes have been abolished by the socialist revolution, as the result of the establishment of socialism, which leads to the withering away of the state; the latter want to destroy the state completely overnight, failing to understand the conditions under which the state can be destroyed. (2) The former recognize that after the proletariat has conquered political power it must utterly demolish the old state machine and substitute for it a new one consisting of an organization of the armed workers, after the type of the Commune; the latter, while insisting on the demolition of the state machine, have absolutely no clear idea of what the proletariat will put in its place and how it will use its revolutionary power; the anarchists even reject the utilization of state power by the revolutionary proletariat, they reject its revolutionary dictatorship. (3) The former demand that use be made of the present-day state in preparing the proletariat for revolution; the anarchists reject this.

¶6 In this controversy it is not Kautsky but Pannekoek who represents Marxism; for it was precisely Marx who taught that the proletariat cannot simply conquer state power in the sense that the old state apparatus passes into new hands, but must smash, break up this apparatus and replace it by a new one.

¶7 Kautsky abandons Marxism and goes over to the opportunists; for this demolition of the state machine, which is utterly unacceptable to the opportunists, completely disappears from his argument, and he leaves a loophole for them in that "conquest" may be interpreted as a simple acquisition of a majority.

§3. Kautsky's Controversy with Pannekoek

¶1-3. How did the "left radical" trend criticize Kautsky? What did the war show? How did Pannekoek describe Kautsky's attitude? How does Pannekoek describe the struggle of the proletariat? What is the content? How does Kautsky respond?

¶4-5. How does Lenin criticize Pannekoek? Does Kautsky know what point of principle is involved? What does he do with it? Is his definition correct? How do the Marxists differ from the anarchists on the state? How do they differ on the tasks of the proletariat following the conquest of power? How do they differ on the present-day state?

¶6-7. Who represents Marxism in the controversy, and why? In what lies Kautsky's abandonment of Marxism? What loophole does he leave?

¶8 To cover up his distortion of Marxism, Kautsky acts like a textualist: he puts forward a "quotation" from Marx himself. In 1850 Marx wrote that "a determined centralization of power in the hands of the state authority" was necessary, and Kautsky triumphantly asks: Does Pannekoek want to destroy "centralism"?

¶9 This is simply a trick, similar to Bernstein's identification of the views of Marxism and Proudhonism on the subject of federalism as against centralism.

¶10 Kautsky's "quotation" is neither here nor there. Centralism is possible with both the old and the new state machine. If the workers voluntarily unite their armed forces, this will be centralism, but it will be based on the "complete destruction" of the centralized state apparatus--the standing army, the police and the bureaucracy. Kautsky acts like an outright swindler by evading the perfectly well-known arguments of Marx and Engels on the Commune and plucking out a quotation which has nothing to do with the point at issue.

¶11 "Perhaps he [Pannekoek]," Kautsky continues, "wants to abolish the state functions of the officials? But we do not get along without officials even in the Party and the trade unions, much less in the state administration. And our programme does not demand the abolition of state officials, but that they be elected by the people.... We are discussing here not the form the administrative apparatus of the 'future state' will assume, but whether our political struggle dissolves [auflost] the state power before we have captured it [Kautsky's italics]. Which ministry with its officials could be abolished?" Then follows an enumeration of the ministries of education, justice, finance and war. "No, not one of the present ministries will be removed by our political struggle against the government.... I repeat, in order to avoid misunderstanding: we are not discussing here the form the 'future state' will be given by victorious Social-Democracy, but how the present state is changed by our opposition." (P. 725.)

¶12 This is an obvious sleight of hand: Pannekoek raised the question of revolution. Both the title of his article and the passages quoted above make this clear. In skipping to the question of "opposition" Kautsky substitutes the opportunist for the revolutionary point of view. What he says means: at present we are an opposition; what we shall be after we have captured power, that we shall see. Revolution has vanished! And that is exactly what the opportunists wanted. What is at issue is neither opposition nor political struggle in general, but revolution. Revolution consists in the proletariat destroying the "administrative apparatus" and the whole state machine, replacing it with a new one, consisting of the armed workers. Kautsky displays a "superstitious reverence" for "ministries"; but why can they not be replaced, say, by committees of specialists, working under sovereign, all-powerful Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies?

¶13 The essential point is not at all whether the "ministries" will remain, or whether "committees of specialists" or some other institutions will be set up; that is quite unimportant. The essential point is whether the old state machine (bound by thousands of threads to the bourgeoisie and permeated through and through with routine and inertia) shall remain, or be destroyed and replaced by a new one. Revolution consists not in the new class commanding, governing with the aid of the old state machine, but in this class smashing this machine and commanding, governing with the aid of a new machine. Kautsky slurs over this basic idea of Marxism, or he has utterly failed to understand it.

¶14 His question about officials clearly shows that he has not understood the lessons of the Commune or the teachings of Marx. "We do not get along without officials even in the Party and the trade unions...."

¶15 We do not get along without officials under capitalism, under the rule of the bourgeoisie. The proletariat is oppressed, the working masses are enslaved by capitalism. Under capitalism democracy is restricted, cramped, curtailed, mutilated by all the conditions of wage slavery, and the poverty and misery of the masses. This and this alone is the reason why the functionaries of our political organizations and trade unions are corrupted--or, more precisely, tend to be corrupted--by the conditions of capitalism and betray a tendency to become bureaucrats, i.e., privileged persons divorced from the masses and standing above the masses.

¶8-10. How does Kautsky cover up his distortion of Marxism? What question does he ask Pannekoek? What does Lenin call his question? How does Lenin refute Kautsky on centralism? How does Kautsky act like a swindler?

¶11-12. What does Kautsky's program demand of state officials? What question does he raise? Why is this sleight of hand? What substitution does he attempt? What disappears? Whose desire does Kautsky meet? What is at issue? In what does revolution consist? How does Lenin reply to Kautsky's "superstitious reverence?" What is unimportant? What is essential? In what does revolution not consist? In what does it consist? How does Kautsky treat this point?

¶13-15. What is Kautsky's question about officials and what does it show? What conditions apply under capitalism? What are the effects on political and trade union functionaries? What do they tend to become? How does Lenin sum up these matters? What will continue until the bourgeoisie is overthrown?

¶16 That is the essence of bureaucracy; and until the capitalists have been expropriated and the bourgeoisie overthrown, even proletarian functionaries will inevitably be "bureaucratized" to a certain extent.

¶16 According to Kautsky, since elected functionaries will remain under socialism, officials will remain, bureaucracy will remain! This is exactly where he is wrong. It was precisely the example of the Commune that Marx used to show that under socialism functionaries will cease to be "bureaucrats," to be "officials," they will cease to be so in proportion as, in addition to the principle of election of officials, the principle of recall at any time is also introduced, and as salaries are reduced to the level of the wages of the average worker, and as parliamentary institutions are replaced by "working bodies, executive and legislative at the same time."

¶17 In essence, the whole of Kautsky's argument against Pannekoek, and particularly the former's wonderful point that we do not get along without officials even in our Party and trade-union organizations, is merely a repetition of Bernstein's old "arguments" against Marxism in general. In his renegade book, The Premises of Socialism, Bernstein wars against the ideas of "primitive" democracy, and against what he calls "doctrinaire democracy": binding mandates, unpaid officials, impotent central representative bodies, etc. To prove that this "primitive" democracy is unsound, Bernstein refers to the experience of the British trade unions, as interpreted by the Webbs. Seventy years of development "in complete freedom," he avers (p. 137, German edition), convinced the trade unions that primitive democracy was useless, and they replaced it with ordinary democracy, i.e., parliamentarism combined with bureaucracy.

¶18 As a matter of fact, the trade unions did not develop "in complete freedom" but in complete capitalist slavery, under which, it goes without saying, "we do not get along" without a number of concessions to the prevailing evil, to violence, falsehood, and exclusion of the poor from the affairs of the "higher" administration. Under socialism much of the "primitive" democracy will inevitably be revived since, for the first time in the history of civilized societies, the mass of the population will rise to take an independent part, not only in voting and elections, but also in the everyday administration. Under socialism all will govern in turn and will soon become accustomed to no one governing.

¶19 Marx, with his critico-analytical genius, perceived in the practical measures of the Commune the turning-point, which the opportunists fear and do not want to recognize because of their cowardice, because they do not want to break irrevocably with the bourgeoisie, and which the anarchists do not want to perceive, either because they are in a hurry or because they do not understand at all the conditions of mass social change. "We must not even think of destroying the old state machine; how can we get along without ministries and officials?" argues the opportunist who is completely saturated with philistinism, and who, at bottom, not only does not believe in revolution, in the creative power of revolution, but mortally fears it (like our Mensheviks and Socialist Revolutionaries).

¶20 "We must think only of destroying the old state machine; it is no use probing into the concrete lessons of earlier proletarian revolutions and analysing what to put in the place of what has been destroyed, and how"--argues the anarchist (the best of the anarchists, of course, and not those who, following Messrs. Kropotkin and Co., trail behind the bourgeoisie); consequently, the tactics of the anarchist become the tactics of desperation instead of ruthlessly bold revolutionary work to solve concrete problems while taking into account the practical conditions of the mass movement.

¶21 Marx teaches us to avoid both errors; he teaches us to act with supreme boldness in destroying the entire old state machine, and at the same time he teaches us to put the question concretely: the Commune was able in the space of a few weeks to start building a new, proletarian state machine by introducing such-and-such measures to secure wider democracy and to uproot bureaucracy. Let us learn revolutionary boldness from the Communards; let us see in their practical measures the outline of urgently practical and immediately possible measures, and then, pursuing this road, we shall achieve the complete destruction of bureaucracy.

¶16-17. On what points does Kautsky recall Bernstein? Against what does Bernstein war? Under what conditions does Bernstein say British trade unions developed? What follows from Lenin? How does socialism abolish the capitalist conditions?
¶18-21. What did Marx perceive in the practical measures of the Commune? How are the opportunists and the anarchists alike on this point? How do they differ? What does the opportunist argue, and why? How do the best of the anarchists argue? How does Lenin judge their tactics, and by what standard? By what means does Marx avoid both errors? What did the Commune do? What is to be learned from it? To what end? What makes this aim possible? To what further end?

¶22 The possibility of this destruction is guaranteed by the fact that socialism will shorten the working day, will raise the masses to a new life, will create such conditions for the majority of the population as will enable everybody, without exception, to perform "state functions," and this will lead to the complete withering away of every kind of state in general.

¶22"Its object [the object of the mass strike]," Kautsky continues, "cannot be to destroy the state power; its only object can be to make the government compliant on some particular question, or to replace a government hostile to the proletariat by one that is accommodating [entgegenkommende] towards it.... But never, under no circumstances, can it [that is, the proletarian victory over a hostile government] lead to the destruction of the state power; it can lead only to a certain shifting [Verschiebung] Of the relation of forces within the state power.... The aim of our political struggle remains, as in the past, the conquest of state power by winning a majority in parliament and by converting parliament into the master of the government." (Pp. 726, 727, 732.)

¶23 This is nothing but the purest and the most vulgar opportunism: repudiating revolution in deeds, while accepting it in words. Kautsky's thoughts go no further than a "government . . . that is accommodating towards the proletariat"-a step backward to philistinism compared with 1847, when The Communist Manifesto proclaimed the idea of "the proletariat organized as the ruling class."

¶24 Kautsky will have to achieve his beloved "unity" with the Scheidemanns, Plekhanovs and Vanderveldes, all of whom agree to fight for a government "that is accommodating towards the proletariat."

¶25 We, however, shall break with these traitors to socialism, and we shall fight for the destruction of the whole old state machine, in order that the armed proletariat itself shall become the government. These are two vastly different things.

¶26 Kautsky will have to enjoy the pleasant company of the Legiens and Davids, Plekhanovs, Potresovs, Tseretelis and Chernovs, who are quite willing to work for the "shifting of the relation of forces within the state power," for "winning a majority in parliament," and "converting parliament into the master of the government." A most worthy object, which is wholly acceptable to the opportunists and which keeps everything within the bounds of the bourgeois parliamentary republic.

¶27 We, however, shall break with the opportunists; and the entire class-conscious proletariat will be with us in the fight--not for a "shifting of the relation of forces," but for the overthrow of the bourgeoisie, for the destruction of bourgeois parliamentarism, for a democratic republic of the Commune type, or a republic of Soviets of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies, for the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat.

¶28 To the right of Kautsky in international socialism, there are trends such as the Socialist Monthly³³ in Germany (Legien, David, Kolb and many others, including the Scandinavians Stauning and Branting); the followers of Jaures and Vandervelde in France and Belgium; Turati, Treves and other representatives of the Right wing of the Italian Party; the Fabians and "Independents" (the Independent Labour Party, which, in fact, has always been dependent on the Liberals)³⁴ in England; and the like. All these gentry, who play a tremendous, very often a predominant role in the parliamentary work and the Party press, repudiate outright the dictatorship of the proletariat and pursue a policy of unconcealed opportunism. In the eyes of these gentry, the "dictatorship" of the proletariat "contradicts" democracy!! There is really no essential difference between them and the petty-bourgeois democrats.

¶29 Taking this circumstance into consideration, we are justified in drawing the conclusion that the Second International, i.e., the overwhelming majority of its official representatives, has completely sunk into opportunism. The experience of the Commune has been not only forgotten, but distorted. Far from inculcating in the minds of the masses of workers the idea that the time is nearing when they must act to smash the old state machine, replace it by a new one, and in this way make their political rule the foundation for the socialist reconstruction of society, these people have actually preached to the masses the very opposite and have depicted the "conquest of power" in a way that has left thousands of loopholes for opportunism.

¶30 The distortion and hushing up of the question of the relation of the proletarian revolution to the state could not but play an immense role at a time when states, which possess a military apparatus expanded as a consequence of imperialist rivalry, have turned into military monsters which are exterminating millions of people in order to settle the issue as to whether England or Germany--this or that finance capital-is to rule the world.*

¶22-27. What aims does Kautsky embrace? What is excluded? How is state power to be conquered? How does Lenin characterize this thinking? How is Kautsky contrasted with the Communist Manifesto? With whom will Kautsky have to unite? What will the revolutionaries do? To what ends? What aims are wholly acceptable to the opportunists? Why? What will the revolutionaries do? Who will be with them? For what aims?

¶28-30. How widespread is the trend of those to the right of Kautsky in international socialism? What role do they play? What stands do they take? With whom do they lack essential differences? What has become of the Second International? What has been done with the experience of the Commune? What responsibilities are neglected? What is actually done? What question is distorted and hushed up? Why?

CHAPTER VII THE EXPERIENCE OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTIONS OF 1905 AND 1917

The subject indicated in the title of this chapter is so vast that volumes could and should be written about it. In the present pamphlet we shall have to confine ourselves, naturally, only to the most important lessons provided by experience, those touching directly upon the tasks of the proletariat in the revolution in relation to state power. [Here the manuscript breaks off -Ed.]

POSTSCRIPT TO THE FIRST EDITION

This pamphlet was written in August and September 1917. I had already drawn up the plan for the next, the seventh, chapter, "The Experience of the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917." But except for the title I had no time to write a single line of the chapter; I was "interrupted" by a political crisis--the eve of the October Revolution of 1917. Such an "interruption" can only be welcomed; but the writing of the second part of the pamphlet ("The Experience of the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917") will probably have to be put off for a long time. It is more pleasant and useful to go through the "experience of the revolution" than to write about it.

NOTES

1 Lenin wrote The State and Revolution while underground in August and September 1917. He first spoke of the necessity of theoretically elaborating the question of the state during the latter half of 1916. At that time he wrote a review entitled "The Youth International" (see Works, 4th Russ. ed., Vol. XXIII, pp. 153-56), in which he criticized Bukharin's anti-Marxist position on the question of the state and promised to write a detailed article on the Marxist attitude to the state. In a letter to A. M. Kollontai dated February 17, 1917, Lenin stated that he had almost finished preparing material on the Marxist attitude to the state. This material was closely written in a small hand in a blue-covered notebook entitled Marxism on the State. It contained a collection of quotations from Marx and Engels and excerpts from books by Kautsky, Pannekoek and Bernstein, with Lenin's critical annotations, conclusions and generalizations.

According to the outlined plan, The State and Revolution was to consist of seven chapters, but the seventh and last chapter, "The Experience of the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917," was never written; all we have is a detailed plan for it. (See Lenin Miscellany, Russ. ed., Vol. XXI, 1933, pp. 25-26.) Concerning the publication of the book, Lenin indicated in a note to the publisher that if he "should take too long to finish this seventh chapter, or if it should turn out to be too bulky, the first six chapters should be published separately as Part One."

On the first page of the manuscript the author of the book appears under the pseudonym of F. F. Ivanovsky. Lenin proposed to use it because the Provisional Government would otherwise confiscate the book. The book was not published until 1918, when there was no longer any need for a pseudonym. A second edition containing a new section, "The Presentation of the Question by Marx in 1852," added by Lenin to Chapter II, appeared in 1919.

2 Fabians--members of the reformist and opportunist Fabian Society, formed by a group of British bourgeois intellectuals in 1884. The society took its name from the Roman General Fabius Cunctator (the "Delayer"), famous for his procrastinating tactics and avoidance of decisive battles. The Fabian Society represented, as Lenin put it, "the most finished expression of opportunism and liberal-labour politics." The Fabians sought to deflect the proletariat from the class struggle and advocated the possibility of a peaceful, gradual transition from capitalism to socialism by means of reforms. During the imperialist world war (1914-18) the Fabians took a social-chauvinist stand. For a characterization of the Fabians, see Lenin's "Preface to the Russian Edition of Letters by I. F. Becker I. Dietzgen F. Engels K. Marx and others to P. A. Sorge and Others (Lenin, Marx-Engels-Marxism Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1953, pp. 245-46), "The Agrarian Programme of Social-Democracy in the Russian Revolution" (Works 4th Russ. ed., Vol. XV, p. 154), and "English Pacifism

The Gotha Programme--the Programme of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany adopted in 1875 at the Gotha Congress, which united the two previously separate German socialist parties, the Eisenachers and the Lassalleans. This programme was thoroughly opportunist since the Eisenachers had made concessions to the Lassalleans on all important questions and had accepted Lassallean formulations. Marx and Engels subjected the Gotha Programme to withering criticism.

In the latter half of the nineties, after Engels' death, the Neue Zeit began systematically to carry articles by revisionists. 24 Cavaignac Louis Eugene--French general and reactionary politician. Appointed in May 1848 as the Minister of War, he suppressed the June uprising of the Parisian workers with particular cruelty. Marx said that "Cavaignac was not the dictatorship of the sabre over bourgeois society; he was the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie by the sabre." (Marx, "The Class Struggles in France, 1848 to 1850," in Marx and Engels, Selected Works FLP, Moscow, 1951, Vol. I, p. 155.)

30 The Hague Congress of the First International was held between September 2 and 7, 1872. It was attended by 65 delegates, among whom were Marx and Engels. The following questions, among others, were on the agenda: 1) the powers of the General Council; 2) the political activity of the proletariat. A sharp struggle with the Bakuninists marked all the proceedings of the Congress. The Congress resolved to extend the powers of the General Council. Its resolution on "The Political Activity of the Proletariat" stated that the proletariat must organize a political party of its own to ensure the triumph of the social revolution and that its great task henceforth was the conquest of political power. The Congress expelled Bakunin and Guillaume from the International as splitters and founders of a new, anti-proletarian party.

31 Zarya (Dawn--a scientific-political Marxist magazine published in Stuttgart in 1901-02 by the editorial board of Iskra. Four issues appeared in three installments. Zarya carried the following articles by Lenin: "Casual Notes," "The Persecutors of the Zemstvo and the Hannibals of Liberalism," the first four chapters of "The Agrarian Question and the 'Critics of Marx'" (under the title "Messrs. the 'Critics' on the Agrarian Question"), "Review of Internal Affairs" and "The Agrarian Programme of Russian Social-Democracy."

32 The reference is to the Fifth International Socialist Congress of the Second International, held on September 23-27, 1900, in Paris, which 791 delegates attended. The Russian delegation consisted of 23 members. On the main question--the conquest of political power by the proletariat--the Congress majority adopted the resolution proposed by Kautsky which Lenin described as "conciliatory with regard to the opportunists." Among other decisions by the Congress was a resolution to establish an International Socialist Bureau to consist of representatives of socialist parties of all countries. Its secretariat was to have its seat in Brussels.

33 Socialist Monthly (Sozialistische Monatshefte)--the chief organ of the opportunists among the German Social-Democrats and an organ of international opportunism. It was published in Berlin from 1897 to 1933. During the imperialist world war of 1914-18 it took a social-chauvinist stand.

34 The Independent Labor Party was formed in 1893 and was led by James Keir Hardie, J. Ramsay MacDonald, and others. It claimed to be politically independent of the bourgeois parties; actually it was "independent of socialism, but dependent upon liberalism" (Lenin). At the beginning of the imperialist world war of 1914-18 the Independent Labour Party issued a manifesto against the war (on August 13, 1914), but later, at the London Allied Socialist Conference in February 1915, its representatives supported the social-chauvinist resolution adopted by that conference. From that time onward the I.L.P. leaders, under cover of pacifist phrases, took a social-chauvinist stand. With the formation of the Communist International in 1919, the I.L.P. leaders, yielding to the pressure of the rank and file, which had moved to the Left, resolved to withdraw from the Second International. In 1921, the I.L.P. joined the so-called Two-and-a-Half International, and after its collapse re-affiliated to the Second International.
